THE MIRACLE OF LOCARNO

A miracle has been taking place at the town of Locarno, Switzerland, where the representatives of the principal nations of Europe have been considering a pact looking to permanent peace.

And more especially the representatives of France and Germany.

And they have agreed! And Von Hindenberg has approved!

And this pact leads to the admission of Germany into the League of Nations as a full member, with the consent of France.

Miracle of Miracles!
 Who would have predicted this in 1914, or 1918, or at any time since?

We are living in a new world, or in a world that is to be made over into a new world, if the present trend of the affairs of the human race shall persist—

When war will be as completely outlawed among civilized nations as dueling has been outlawed among civilized men—

And the United States will go into the League of Nations, through the front door, and take the place she should have had all along in the affairs of the world.

MAKE THEM BEAUTIFUL

If we are to have a program for the building of permanent bridges in Salem, wherever they are needed, the plan should include the making of beautiful structures.

The idea of the City Beautiful for Salem is worthy of the support of hard headed business men, as well as all others. There is business in beauty, and there is every other thing worthy of an upstanding and progressive people.

PRESERVATION OF WILD FOWL

Of special interest to the sportsmen who hunt wild fowl is the proposition of the Oregon state game commission to reflood the Lower Klamath Lake bed in order to restore the former refuge for water birds. According to the commission it is necessary to restore this feeding and breeding ground to save the water fowl whose habitat is Oregon and Northern California, from extermination.

Great losses of bird life have been reported recently from the Klamath Lake region. The cause is attributed to alkali poisoning resulting from crowding the birds into the receding waters of small lakes which are strongly alkaline.

The draining of Klamath Lake basin a year or two ago was done by the government for the purpose of reclaiming what was believed would be valuable peat and agricultural lands. Now it is reported by soil experts that cultivation is here impossible on account of the large amount of alkali present and the impossibility of sufficient drainage.

The eighty thousand acres of this land is an ideal refuge for water fowl and should be restored for this purpose. Of course land speculators who secured holdings here when the lake was drained will oppose reflooding. This must be expected. In fact it was the speculative element among the politicians who secured the drainage.

Game birds are of great value to the state of Oregon known far and wide as the "Hunter's paradise." The preservation of bird life is quite as important as propagation of it which costs vast sums of money annually. In addition to the advertising value of this variety of wild life, the recreational and food values of it command consideration.

To allow the extermination of a vast number of ducks, geese and other wild birds in order that land speculators may hold out from its legitimate uses the Klamath Lake basin, is wrong. And the injustice thus wrought affects not only the sportsmen but the entire citizenship of the state.

A VITAL PROTEST

Protest against boys and girls attending the Murray murder trial is both timely and commendable. Vigorous protest should also be launched against the attendance of youth at divorce and at trials where immorality is emphasized.

Only evil can result from filling immature minds with the sensational, degrading and even nauseating actions and moral filth which characterize many of these cases. And if the parents or guardians cannot or will not keep youth away from these trials, and they are beyond the compulsory school law, the courts should find some way to keep them out of the court room. In fact this exclusion should have been made effective long ago.

CHAPTER F32
 The Reason Madge's Heart Warmed to Mrs. Marks.

I looked critically, anxiously, at the coat Dicky held out to me with the assertion that he could not wear it to the banquet upon which he had counted, and that therefore he would have to stay at home.

"What is the matter with it?" I asked. "I don't see anything. Really, Dicky, aren't you a trifle captious because you're prejudiced against Mrs. Marks? It appears to me to be pressed beautifully."

"Sweetly," would be a better word," Dicky sneered. "I'm not saying anything against the work," he admitted grudgingly. "She's as good a presser as I ever saw, beats most of the tailors."

"Then what is the trouble?" I persisted. "Simply that my taste in creases and that of Mr. 'Petey' Marks lie in directly opposite directions."

Dicky exclaimed, his voice heavy with sarcasm. "Do you see that elaborate razor-like crease along the sleeve here, and—"

He explained the fine points of tailoring at some length, winding up with the banal assertion that he wouldn't wear the clothes as they appeared to a dog fight.

"Just Wait—"

I understood very little of his dissertation, but I grasped and was sorry for the genuine disappointment which had replaced the anger in his voice.

"Look here, Dicky," I said when he had finished. "If all the rest of the pressing is all right except these creases, I believe I could take those out for you. I have pressed my own things many times. Won't you let me try?"

I purposely made my voice as coaxing as possible, and Dicky looked at me dubiously, but with a gleam of something very like relief in his eyes.

"You can't make 'em any worse," he said at last, "and you might just happen to turn the trick. Here let me show you what I mean by the right kind of crease."

"Just wait until I switch on the iron," I pleaded. "It can be heating while you tell me, and then I won't lose any time."

I did not wait for his assent, but sped down the hall to the kitchen, and, putting my ironing board between the table and a stout chair, switched on my electric iron and went back to the living-room where Dicky with the aid of what he termed a properly-pressed suit, showed me the difference between the creases.

A Written Message.

"This sort of a thing is the top of the milk for the week-end 'young men about town,' he said contemptuously, "but I'd rather attend that banquet in golf knickers and the upper part of a pair of pajamas, than in these things as they are now."

"I'll do my best with them," I said, "only don't come near the kitchen unless I send for you. I shall be nervous enough without any suggestions."

"Much time I have for going anywhere," Dicky retorted. "Me for a bath and a shave. I'm going to have these whether you succeed in getting the lounge lizard creases out of the clothes or not. And—you're a pretty good sport, old girl. Give us a kiss."

I returned his caress dutifully, amazed by his evident belief that he had squared all accounts with the pseudo apology. Then with the suit which Dicky had pointed out as a model of pressing over one arm, and his evening clothes over the other, I proceeded to the kitchen.

The bathroom door slammed a few seconds later, and I knew that his bath and shave would keep him out of my way for a quarter of an hour at least.

I had no conscious thought of Mrs. Marks in my ultimatum to Dicky that I did not wish him to come near the kitchen while I was working at the clothes, but when I heard her tiptoeing into the room behind me, I realized that subconsciously I had been expecting her. She had a cheap tablet of note paper and a pencil in her hand and she held the tablet out to me.

"I don't care to say nothing out loud," I read in a round child-like script, "but I couldn't help hearing, and I know what he means. Just give me a look at the other suit, and I'll have those ready for you in a jiffy. You mustn't try them if you're not used to them. You'd spoil them."

I raised my eyes and looked at her gratefully, and with sudden, genuine liking in spite of her crudity and her doubtful surroundings. There were few women, I reflected, in any station of life, who would persist in helping out a neighbor after Dicky's criticism of her efforts which I now knew she had overheard.

That there was something behind her offer besides sheer good nature I guessed, of course, but was content to leave its discovery to the future. For the present I was only too glad to surrender Dicky's suit to her capable hands and stand silently watching her while she efficiently brought them into the form he desired.

Beautiful fall weather—
 But most farmers need rain.
 Some wonderful sugar beets have been raised on the experimental tracts in the Salem district.

There are tracts that have produced on the basis of ten tons to the acre, and there is little doubt concerning the high sugar content. The adaptability of most of our valley soils to the production of a beet with a high sucrose (sugar) content has been demonstrated many times, commencing away back several years before the beginning of the World war.

NOTICE

SCHOOL POST PHONED
 Sept. 28, 1925

The above notice was found by a Salem man posted on the front door of the school house of the Shotgun Creek district in Clackamas county a few days ago. It is to be hoped that the "post-phoned" school has taken up by this time. The notice was signed by a name that is probably that of one of the directors, or the clerk of the district.

The meriwana principle of law, sought to be established in the Tom Murray trial, would be a great thing for the murderers of the Oriental countries, if the thing could be put over and made universal. The life of the killers of men would be made one glad, sweet song.

ANNOUNCING THE NEW UNIVERSAL SUPERHEATOR

Again Cribben & Sexton, manufacturers of the well known Universal Heaters and Ranges, make another step toward perfect and economical heating large and small homes, garages, halls, schools, churches, etc.

The Universal Superheater is the key to this better heating. The Superheater, while a beautiful, walnut-finished cabinet heater, is unlike others you may be familiar with. It is announced by Cribben & Sexton Company only after exhaustive experiments and research. In it are combined only those principles which are demonstrated successes. In it, the shortcomings or defects of other cabinet-type heaters have been avoided.

Here is Cribben & Sexton Company's latest contribution to heating science. It is this handsome, walnut-finished Universal Superheater. This improved cabinet heater utilizes natural laws of warm air circulation—uses these laws to give any home all the comfort of the finest basement heating plant.

The Universal Superheater automatically forces a lively circulation by drawing cold air from the floors into the bottom of the beautiful cabinet to be humidified, purified, vitalized and rapidly superheated in the extra-large heating chamber. Then this warm, healthful air rushes out of the top and travels to the furthest corner of every room.

Trade In Your Old Heater

No hot spots. No cold spots. It equalizes comfort in every part of every room.

Don't confuse the Universal Superheater with ordinary cabinet heaters. Cribben & Sexton Company have worked on it for years—announcing it only after they were sure it was a SUPERheater, superior to any other method of heating small homes.

You can use any kind of fuel in the Superheater—soft coal, hard coal, wood or briquettes—because it contains Cribben & Sexton Company's patented, duplex grate and because it is an engineered heater throughout.
