CHAPTER 142

WHAT MADGE DID TO HELP DICKY HELP HIMSELF

It needed no great degree of either feminine intuition or masculine logic for me to see that for some reason Dicky did not wish me to examine too closely the bandage which protected the wound on his head, and the terrified anxiety which I had felt for him began to be tinged with a vague suspicion that there was something queer about the accident which he had suffered.

At any rate, I told myself, he was not so badly injured as to preclude his being decidedly cross, and I remembered with much comfort an old fashioned saying, "When they're ugly they're in no danger."

But with a craft of which I was ashamed, yet which seemed to have taken possession of me, wily as I resolved that in some way I would get a look at the bandages which Dicky seemed so anxious to keep from my observation.

It was, therefore, in the most casual manner that I straightened from my stooping posture and said quietly:

"Yes, I suppose it would hurt less if you attended to it yourself. If you can spare me, I'll slip out to the kitchen and prepare a sterilized solution with which you can wash the cut."

"For Pete's sake," Dicky growled, "don't begin any of that imitation nurse-dope! Water from the tap will be plenty good enough for me when I feel fit enough to attend to it."

Madge is Diplomatic.

His tone and words would have completely discouraged anyone not used to him. But the remembrance of other sick-room experiences with my husband taught me that not only would he use the things I had prepared, but that he would be decidedly disappointed and disagreeable if I did not prepare them.

"All right," I said soothingly. "But I'll get a basin and cloths ready before I go back to bed." His eyelids flickered at that and I knew that I had set him to wondering whether I really meant to leave him alone. I wasted no time in any further words, but slipped out to the kitchen and prepared the solution, putting it in a large covered dish which I kept. I carried it to the bathroom and set it on the tiny table beside the basin and laid nearby bandages, gauze and scissors.

While in the kitchen, I had snatched the opportunity to set a pot of coffee of extra strength over the fire, and by the time I had arranged the table in the bathroom for Dicky's use, I knew from the aroma which floated through the halls that it was ready. Hurrying back to the kitchen, I prepared a cup as Dicky best liked it, and carried it into the front room.

"Let Me Play Valet."

He was lying as I had left him.

but his eyes were wide open, and he was staring at the wall opposite him. I pronounced his name twice before he turned his eyes toward me, and even then I had a queer little feeling that he did not see me, that instead there was something else which his brain was visioning.

And then, with a little start, the odd visioning look left his face, and his eyes turned to mine with something in them which set me to speculating morbidly. For it was almost a remorseful look which his eyes held, and while his general grouchiness might have called for apology, there was no occasion that I knew of for anything stronger.

"Ob! Coffee!" he said in such sprightly fashion that my suspicions deepened. Such nonchalant glibness must have taken a distinct effort with the pain which he was patiently suffering. "Now you're talking! That for me!" He raised himself on his elbow with an attempt at jauntness which ended in an involuntary little groan. But I had set down the coffee upon a convenient chair, and my arm went around him just in time to prevent his sinking back again.

"Let me play valet," I coaxed, and reaching for the coffee, I held it to his lips, while he drained it. I knew that it was a sure stimulus for him, and I was not surprised a few seconds later to see him sit up determinedly and get out of the bed.

"Where's your dope?" He grinned at me comprehendingly. "I know you made it, of course, and I appreciate it even though I am a pig-headed grouch." "In the bathroom," I returned. "You'll find everything you need, but are you sure I can't help you?" "Not just now. I'll call you if I need another bandage put on." He kept his word and, after a few minutes, summoned me to the bathroom. He had cleansed the wound—luckily not a serious one—but though my eyes went quickly, furtively, to every corner of the room, there was no trace of the bandages which he had taken off. (To be continued.)

BANDIT, OFFICER, DIE MUSKOGON, Mich., Oct. 31.—Detective Charles Hammond, 47, died on the operating table to-night from bullet wounds received in a shooting affray with an unidentified man whom he killed. Police doubt that the detective's assailant is Martin Durkin, "bullet-proof vest bandit," sought in Chicago, as at first believed.

SALEM HAS RUSSIAN BALLET

Studio Where Classes Are Forming With Home Talent

Dancing Pavillion Open and Parents Can See Work for Themselves

Shall Salem become a center for training in the Russian ballet? Russian dancing has been accepted by all great dance artists as affording the greatest field for this womanliest of all athletic and graceful arts. It includes dances of all nations, woven into a cosmopolitan ballet, including esthetic, character, oriental, posture, Slovak, Japanese, Egyptian, Slav, feature and figure dances in costumes, expressive of the greatest individual beauty and symmetry of the human figure. The Russian ballet, including solo dances in all the above lines of the dance art, will be developed, and Russian ballets will be performed before public audiences in the Capital city. If the Russian ballet classes already organized are supported, the movement will result in a fine arts building or auditorium being erected in the Capital city that will make ballet an industry attracting hundreds of students and employing many trainers of the large classes that will come to seek instruction.

The Russian ballet is itself a great school for physical training church members, or have some denominational or religious preference, according to a report compiled by the campus Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. officials. This figure shows a slight proportional decrease over last year for girls and women, training the muscles to the fine temper of Damascus steel, correcting all defects of the figure and developing grace and elasticity of youth that accompanies the individual all through life. In autobiography, the greatest all-around American actress, Mrs. Gilbert, one of the famous Kemble family, attributes her career of 60 years on the stage without a day of illness to her training as a child and young girl in the ballet. In her days of youth in toe dancing, gave her muscles of steel, and the finest spritz steel at that, which enabled her to play young woman parts when she was in the sixties. Modern life demands of its womanhood 100 per cent physical efficiency, and there is little place for the invalidism that was cultivated by the society women in the days of our forefathers.

"The Russian ballet," says Helen Rodolf, an expert teacher who is organizing classes in the Capital city, "cures all physical defects, such as flat feet, fallen arches, one leg short (and there are many such), and secures perfect poise and posture of the body, symmetrical shoulders and bust, and perfect breathing. With more perfect coordination of the mind and body rhythm and grace take the place of awkwardness in the growing child, young girl or adult." Training in the Russian school of dancing has none of the objections raised by modern jazzing, as all the dancing is by groups and individuals. The training tends to alertness of mind and a when 92 per cent expressed some church preference. Presbyterians lead with 560 giving this denomination their preference, while the Methodist Episcopalians come second with 381 and those of the Christian church, third, with 240. Others in order of their totals, are: Episcopalians, 205; Christian Scientists, 138; Catholics, 131; Baptists, 118; Congregationalists, 98; Lutherans, 37; Jewish, 18; Unitarian, 16; Latter Day Saints in this most modern art has been offered the Salem people, and parents can give their children advantages that are offered only in a metropolis.

Investments in these accomplishments pay the biggest dividends in the development of our young people, both in the pride of the family and the individual being stimulated, and in ability to earn money in the lines of professional dancing that was never in so great demand in all parts of our country, to say nothing of the moral value of lifting the children into a realm of higher thought and inspiration," says Miss Rodolf. She has been a professional dancer from her childhood.

Russian ballet will be introduced at Salem early next year by the classes now training, and entirely done by home talent under the direction of Miss Rodolf, who has become a resident of Salem. She also is teaching classes at Medford and other towns. The photo engravings on this page represent her in poses in the Storm dance and Egyptian pageantry.
