

MAJORITY OF SUGAR BEET SAMPLES SHOW HIGH PERCENTAGE OF SUGAR CONTENT; TONNAGE GOOD

Results of the Willamette valley sugar beet tests conducted through the Chamber of Commerce were forwarded to Salem Friday by J. W. Timpon, Washington manager of the Utah-Idaho Sugar company.

"I might say that the beets should run over 15 per cent in should run over 15 per cent in minimum in order to be profitable from the manufacturer's standpoint," Mr. Timpon writes.

Willamette valley, with purities correspondingly higher. Only four of the 17 samples showed tests under the 15 per cent stated by Mr. Timpon while one tested 18 per cent.

MARION-POLK BEE MEN HOLD MEETS

Committees Are Named for Marion and Polk County Organization

The meeting of the bee keepers of Marion and Polk counties, held at the Salem Chamber of Commerce rooms commencing at 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon, was well attended.

The program as published in The Statesman of Thursday was carried out. Mr. Kendall of the Western Colorado Bee Keepers' association, who happened to be motoring through, was present and gave an instructive talk.

R. J. Hendricks of Salem and J. Peismulder of Woodburn were named as members of an organization committee for the Marion county bee keepers.

The meeting then adjourned, to go to Dallas for the evening session at 7:30. More bee keepers were present at the Salem meeting from Polk county than from Marion county, though Marion county was pretty well represented, and the meeting was a good one.

Prof. Scullen of the Oregon Agricultural college was present at both meetings, and made important addresses and answered many questions.

Winnie Braden, secretary of the Dallas Chamber of Commerce, was present at the Salem meeting. Secretary Wilson of the Salem Chamber of Commerce presided at the meeting here.

The meeting at Dallas was very well attended and resulted in the complete organization of Polk county. H. M. Mead of Salem, route 2, whose home is at Brunk's Corner, was elected president.

Dr. Alfred Hollins Displays Remarkable Versatility in Program Last Night at First Methodist Church

By AUDRED BUNCH A tremendously enthusiastic audience greeted Dr. Alfred Hollins, blind organist, last night when he appeared in an incomparably done recital at the First Methodist church before a medium-sized crowd.

Dr. Hollins gave one of the most strikingly successful features of his programs—a number that proved both a challenge and an example of demonstration of the genius and versatility of the man.

In the next group of numbers Watling's Minuet Antique was probably the most favorably received, a number as piquant as it was unusual and lovely.

A program that proved a rare treat for all present closed with that wonderfully descriptive tonal overture, William Tell.

Dr. Hollins is making his American tour under the honorary auspices of the National Association of Organists and plans to remain in America until the early part of February.

THE "DINNER PROBLEM" THAT SUDDENLY CONFRONTED MADGE

"Dear girl"—Lillian's letter began—"I've almost finished a whole corridor floor of the winter resort which is supposed to be paved with good intentions.

I paused in my reading for a reminiscent, indulgent smile. Lillian is undoubtedly one of the most exasperating correspondents one could find in a lifetime of search, but she has so many lovable ways that her friends find it impossible to become irritated over her dilatoriness.

"I am coming home sooner than I anticipated," the letter went on. "Robert is planning a trip to Europe, taking his sister with him. It is quite a sudden decision, and they will go within the next two weeks.

"Naturally, Mrs. Cosgrove will be exceedingly busy with her preparations, and I feel that Marion, and I subtracted much from her already limited time, although she is so kind and courteous that she will not agree with me. But I am coming home the twentieth, reach New York entrance of tubes about five o'clock. No use trying to meet me, for those trains are uncertain at this season. But I will take a taxi directly over to your apartment. I would go to a hotel without troubling you, but I have had experience in evading your wonderful insistent hospitality before and I now meekly obey your orders always to come to you, wherever you are.

"Until the Twentieth"

"Marion is wonderfully well, as am I. The sojourn here has done us both untold good. I feel like a husky section boss with a new piece of track to lay, I am so anxious to get back to work!

I read the letter over again slowly, and then turned for the third time to the paragraph concerning Robert Savarin's projected European trip. Then I laid the letter down and sat staring into space, trying to visualize the situation which Lillian's letter adroitly glossed over.

That something had happened to mar the perfect understanding between Lillian and Robert, I well knew from the mere fact that the artist was willing to put the ocean between himself and the woman whom he had loved devotedly and hopelessly for weary years.

"Quite a sudden decision," Lillian had written. That meant that the breach had come quickly, and I, who knew Mrs. Cosgrove's fierce unreasoning championship for her brother, realized that staying at the Catskill mountain home a minute longer than she could get away, would be an athema to Lillian's pride.

A Sudden Hope

With a little shake of my shoulders, I reminded my troubled spirit that it was no affair of mine, and that I would doubtless hear more about it in good time. Lillian, reticent to a fault, confides in me more than in any other person on earth, and I have always felt honored by her trust.

I put the letter on the mantelpiece, for Dicky's perusal—there was nothing in it which Lillian would not wish him to see, and he always enjoys reading her letters. Then I looked at my desk calendar and verified the dismaying suspicion which had come to me at the reading of the letter.

The twentieth was today. At approximately five o'clock Lillian and Marion would reach the apartment, and the Braithwaites would arrive but an hour later. How was I to contrive dinner for them all on my two-hole gasplate? Of course we could take them all out to a restaurant, but I knew that Marion would be sleepy after her journey and Lillian nervously fatigued, while Harriet Braithwaite would frankly rebel at subjecting Edwin's faulty indigestion to any fare save that prepared under her direction. No in some manner I must manage a home dinner.

I delight in emergencies and in planning ways and means to overcome them, but for a few dismayed seconds I felt that this—

In old Betty's parlance — was "something else again." Then I squared my shoulders, and reflecting that the plans for the dinner could wait, but that the selection of the apartment for the Braithwaites could not, I locked my door and descended the stairs to the basement in search of the janitor.

He was not to be found in his unusual haunts, and I made my way through the dusky corridors toward the gleam of daylight which evidently came from the street. And then I found myself beside a doorway, looking at a homely picture which gave me the sudden hope of solving my dinner problem.
