CHAPTER F156. DOSE OF SEDATIVE

The front windows of our leaning out once can command a view of both sides of the street for many yards. Only two or three seconds had elapsed between Dicky's departing bang of the front door and my half involuntary rush to the window. There was no possible chance of his getting out of sight in that time if he had walked directly up or down the street as in his daily could I see him. I was forced to the conclusion that either he had gone into one of the small shops near the door-cheap places which lure for his fastidious tastes-or Ministry to Meet Situation that he still was standing in the small entrance hall of the apartment, waiting-for what?

Civilization is the thinnest veneer possible. I was forced to 189 N. High St., Heilig Bldg. 181f that conclusion when I found myself at the upper hall door, my hand on the knob ready to rush down the stairs and confirm my suspicions in primitive fashion. gave a little shudder at the readthese with which all my tenets of ethical conduct and good breeding had vanished at Dicky's queer conduct, and, returning to the living room, sat down, and forced myself back to sanity and the renewed resolution to reserve judgment upon my temperamental husband until something more definite than the odd coincidences of the last 24 hours came under my observation. But while I was able to control my jealous anger, all the more consuming because I had but vague ideads of the cause for it, could not restore my nerves to steadiness. All the zest was gone from my plans for the dinner with which I had meant to welcome Lillian. I wished, wearily, that I had disregarded Edwin Braithwaite's delicate digestion, his wife's care of him, and Lillian's liking for home cooking, and permitted Dicky to take them all to a restaurant. I could have plead ed a headache and remained at home. Indeed, I felt forebodingly that I would not have needed to plead an untruth. My temples were giving me all the preliminary symptoms of a severe nervous ladache.

I always have avoided drugs for headaches, but this was a real emergency. After combating Dicky's wishes anr maneuvering him into compliance with my plan for dinner at home. I simply sition. I went into the bathroom took down a bottle of pellets generally recommended for headaches and swallowed two of them, the dose usually prescribed for extreme pain. Then I went into the bedroom and lay down, trying to relax for the few minutes' interval I had calculated could be devoted to getting myself together. With great relief I felt tho throbbing leave my temples and a grateful drowsiness steal over me. I remembered my uncanny ability to awaken at any minute wished, and looking at my wrist watch, I fixed upon fifteen minutes as the length of my nap and drifted off into slumber.

The double dose of sedative was too powerful for my will power. however, and I did not know how long I would have slept if I had not heard the screech and clang of fire apparatus racing along the a street. I jumped up nervously, rushed to the window, saw that they were already far down the street, and assured that there was no danger near, looked at my watch, finding that I had slept a half hour instead of the quarter I had alloted myself.

With a hasty re-furbishing of ADELE GARRISON'S NEW PHASE my tollet, I sat down and made out a methodical list of the extra dishes and silver I would need for the dinner, for the resources of the apartment were the usual ones given "light housekeeping." and I had not brought any of our solid silver with us for fear of thieves. I meant to get the extra things I needed at the nearest WHY MADGE TOOK A DOUBLE- five and ten-cent store, and even through my depression my lips curved in a mischievous grin as I visioned Harriet Braithwaite's fasapartment are so situated that by tidious face when she should see the outlay. I checked my list carefully, then went into the kitchen to be sure that I had omitted no item necessary for the dinner, as I had no time to make a separate trip to the shops. I was almost ready to leave when I caught a glimpse of something white beneath the kitchen table, and picking it up, saw it was one of Dicky's handkerchiefs, freshly ironed, and folded custom, but in neither direction in a fashion which his laundry never used.

LONDON - "Her Grace, the Archbishop of Canterbury," may be known by the present generation of children in England.

So evidently is the lack of candidates for the ministry in the Church of England that authorities are being forced to consider the problem of admitting women to the Holy orders. Several leading churchmen have warned that the day of women

Seek American Movie Stars to Bolster British Trade

LONDON .- English moving picure producers are attempting to gain a place in the movie sun with he aid of American experience, lirectors and actors. The producrs here are about ready to admit hat British films cannot successully compete with American proluctions principally because Engand lacks movie "names." Arrangements have been made bring some of America's forenost producers to England to prouce some of the great English lassics in the natural surroundngs of the stories. In most cases he leads will be taken by Amerian stars. These productions, the packers hope, will be able to meet he American films on an equal basis and at least open a market for British films in the Dominions and European countries.

A shortage of money for large productions also has contributed greatly to the mediocrity of Britsh pictures which will not have to be considered in the new productions, it is said.
