CHAPTER F158

MADGE'S INTUITION MADE HER DESIRE THE TRUTH

I made short work of my errands. Shopping in "the five and ten" is neither a discriminating nor a thrilling task, and I soon had piled up enough articles to supply all my crockery deficiencies. I arranged to have a messenger deliver them within the hour, and then gave myself up to the quest which always takes me out of myself and banishes all troublesome thoughts—that for flowers. I wanted blossoms for my table, for the mantel, and also to smile a welcome to my sister-in-law from the cheap stuffy apartment which had been the only thing I had been able to secure for her.

A florist's shop in the next street to the apartment was as colorfully riotous as an old-fashioned garden. With a shiver at the remembrance of the atrocious wall paper on our walls, I realized that the different tones of yellow were the only things I could use. So for the mantel over the fireplace I selected a low brown bowl and bought enough calendulas to fill it, reveling in the gorgeous tones of bronze and orange and lemon while theye were being put into the box, I wanted roses for my table, and we rejoiced indeed when the clerk, with rare understanding brought out immediately the only shade I could use. They were great creamy blossoms, opened just enough to show ravishing golden hearts.

I am rarely without flowers of some kind, but with city prices I had confined myself to a blossom or two for table and mantel, placed in tiny vases which I had brought from home. These I mentally assigned to Harriet's bedroom, and after a few minute's search, I found just the low spreading container I wished for my roses. Then I bought another low bowl for Harriet's mantel with enough pink snapdragons and sweet peas to fill it and her bedroom vases. I took Harriet's flowers and bowl with me, for I wished to get her rooms ready for her coming before I started my cooking, and left orders for the rest to be delivered at four o'clock.

A Confused Reply.

The beauty and frangrance of the crowding blossoms in the shop had been like a heady draught to my spirit, making me forget the annoyance and perplexities I had left behind me. But with every step that I took toward the apartment, there descended upon me the weight of uneasiness which I had felt before.

Mr. Schartz was polishing the door knobs when I came in, and when he saw me, the cloth in his hand dropped abruptly.

"You—you—back already?" he stammered.

"Oh, yes!" I returned, wondering a little at his manner. "I didn't have much to do. Did you find anybody in the hall above us when you went up there?"

He stepped to pick up his polishing cloth before he answered and an intelligent child could have noted his reddened face, his averted eyes and confused manner when he spoke.

"Oh yah! we find somebody but it was nobody outside . It vas schust one of the mens in the house vaiting to play a schoke on his vife. He is awfully funny fellow, dot man, alvays cutting up, but he don't mean notings."

"I wish he could play his jokes somewhere else then," I said crossly, not because I really felt any annoyance toward the unknow jester, but because the janitor's manner made me feel that he was concealing something from me, although I tried to reason myself out of the patently absurd notion. I do not like being startled in that way.

"I do not think he vill do dot again," Mr. Schwartz returned grimly. "I told him a few tings ven I saw him about how you was frightened."

"You Husband is Oop Stairs."

"But I wasn't—" I began, then closed my lips upon the protest. There was no need to define my mental processes to the old janitor.

"It was very good of you to attend to it, Mr. Schartz," I said. "Thank you so much."

"It vas nodings," he returned, then as I turned toward the stairs he cleared his throat nervously.

"Your husband is oop stairs," he said. "He coom home schust a little vile after you go avay."

"Thank you." I replied with mechanical coolness, but my brain was whirling, for with intuition sharpened by my own brooding, I had seized upon the truth which the old janitor was trying to conceal.

Dicky had been the man in the hallway above!
