TWO SOURCES FOUND OF BORDER LIQUORS

Home Brew and Rum Smuggled From Mexico Increase Supply in Texas

DALLAS—Home brewers in the cities, corn whisky distillers in the timber lands of East Texas, and a liquid trickle across the Texas-Louisiana boundary from the wet spots of New Orleans, are at present the chief sources of hard liquor for Texans.

The Mexican border and the gulf coast have become negligible factors in the forbidden industry, say enforcement officials of three arms of the Federal service fighting the prohibition battle in this part of the world.

Most of the liquor entering the state now is coming overland from New Orleans, the fairly effective coast and border blockade shutting off the supply from Mexico and the gulf. Tiquilla, the Mexican drink, in late months has increased from $4 a gallon to $12 at San Antonio, indicating a scarcity in that quarter.

Since the prohibition raids in New Orleans last August, however, the supply from this source again has diminished, the prices of New Orleans whisky doubling in this state. Before the raids New Orleans whisky sold at $6 a quart in half case lots. Today the price is about $12 a quart.

The sale of Jamaica Ginger, or "Jake" as the trade calls, it is reported to have increased enormously in northwest Texas lately, and this is interpreted by enforcement officials as a sign that real liquor is scarce. The consumption of "Jake," which is tincture of ginger and about 96 per cent alcohol, has increased 10 fold since prohibition became a law. Officials report that before prohibition a gallon would have lasted Fort Worth a month. These officials have no control over the sale of this article.

Frank Cole, assistant state prohibition administrator, said the East Texas woods "are full of stills," operated by farmers principally for home consumption. They work almost unmolested because the swampy country makes it difficult to locate them.

Liquor truck drivers are paid $75 a round trip from San Antonio to New Orleans, the trip taking a week.

The rum runners on the coast apparently have never recovered from the seizure of three boats in 1923 in which they lost upwards of $1,000,000. When successful in eluding the guard, the runners can sell the stuff for $25 to $30 a case over the ship's side.
