Willamette River Veteran Writes of Old Time Romantic Scenes

By Frank J. Smith Of all the wealth of romance and picturesque charm that nature and savage generations have dropped in the lap of the Willamette no more interesting gem remains than Coalco Pillar, carved by nature as a rugged western sphinx, to stand guard while new races and strange inventions sweep away the old with ruthless hand.

There by the Willamette. perched high above the stream. where the roar of the falls dwinof the hungry gull ventures but what I have done." rarely, stands the monolith, fashioned by nature, perchance in an idle mood when only the savage stone men struggled with uncouth monsters by the river's

Careless passengers by boat and train catching a brief view exclaim, "What's that?" and peer forward for new landmarks and beauties; loitering urchins, looking for adventure in the twilight, catch a fleeting glimpse of the stone giant and scared by imagined evils, chase home; idle lovers, rowing by moonlight, aimlessly drift by the stalwart guardian of the valley and weave strang fankeeps perpetual watch.

Romance enough is there mingled with this image; traditions have marked for their own and cling like ivy to its bold, bleak bia county-"If I must go on reclines and carve anew this thing ord as to whether I agree with the of stone into fantastic or mysterious forms.

Down the bank, broken, prone and crumbling lies the companion county - "The governor's stateto the gaunt guardian, a compan- ment, I say to you, I say to him, ion which after a world of faith- and I say to the people, is a downful battling succumbed to wind right lie." and rain, tempest and crackling heat and tottered headless to a county-"Had the governor re-

This romantic pillar is formed of one stone , 30 feet in height, having the appearance of the head and neck of a huge giant, the head being about 12 feet in diameter and 10 feet in length; the neck of the colossus is about six feet in length and has a diameter of three feet.

The head, like the cliff that supports it, is of solid bassalt, firm and hard, while the neck is full of seams and cracks, showing few years must succumb to the high perch and like its mate a spect the chief executive I must FOR RENT—EIGHT HOUSES AND flats, $12 to $55.
