STEADY PROGRESS IN OUR CELERY INDUSTRY

There is steady progress in our celery industry, and the outlook for growing this delicious vegetable on a gigantic scale within a few years was never before as bright.

For it is already around a million dollar annual crop in our Labish district alone, counting the head lettuce and other commercial vegetable crops of the group of growers there.

Just a little while ago, the farmers of the Labish district were boasting for their proposed "million dollar highway"—and it is already at least a two million dollar highway, counting its potato and onion and other crops; that is, it produces at least two million dollars a year in cash crops.

And its possibilities are only so far fairly glimpsed.

For seven or eight years, the Slogan editor has been saying that the Salem district can grow and does grow the best celery in the world. He was at first regarded as a crank on the subject. Here are some proofs: Eugene celery in 1921 took second prize at the national celery contest; and Prof. Bouquet of the Oregon Agricultural College said the Oregon exhibitors gained a greater victory than the taking of the prize in that contest. Troutdale, Oregon, celery took first prize in 1922 at the national contest at Indianapolis—and it was taken by a man who was a celery grower before coming to Oregon in the famous Kalamazoo, Michigan, district.

In 1924 Oregon celery took all three prizes—first, second and third, at the annual meeting and exhibition of vegetable gardeners at Louisville, Kentucky.

And at the annual banquet held there then the name of Oregon as the greatest of all the celery states, in point of quality, was on the tongue of all the experts gathered there.

The Labish district, just north of Salem, produces as high quality celery as can be grown in Oregon.

And by the same sign the best in the world.

Last year this celery went in car lots to twenty states and to the Dominion of Canada.

And it graced the White House Thanksgiving table of President Coolidge and that of United States Senator Chas. L. McNary, whose home is here, and who has a farm near where it is grown. The demand for our quality article was greater than our supply, in the big Eastern and other markets.

And the prices were $1 and better a crate above the best California celery. Besides the car shipments, there were many express orders and local demands.

And the coming crop will be a larger one than last year's production. The better prices paid for our superior celery run to $160 to $180 a car above the market prices of the California product.

Do you realize what else that means? It means the development here of a gigantic celery industry. The acreage will grow every year. It may go up to 4000 to 5000 cars annually, and in a few years. It is bound to become such a gigantic industry in good time, because of the immense money value of quality. It is enough to make up the difference between profit and loss, or between small profits and large gains.

The world is the market. Our celery stands up under long shipments.

The pioneering has been done. The proofs are at hand. Our growers can produce celery and make it a profitable crop on wide areas.

But, what is more important, they can produce celery of the best quality grown in the United States, which means the best in the world—and they are doing just this.

For the Salem district, this is another case of taking the line of least resistance; of getting above competition; of producing the things we can produce better than any other district, or at a lower cost, or at greater profit; of doing the things at which we excel.

There has been a lot of progress in the celery industry here in seventeen years; in four years. What was a dream a short time ago has partly come true; is a clear vision now; a certainty of some time in the future, and perhaps not far distant future.

There is no mystery about the celery industry here. What one man has done, or what a few men have accomplished, can be duplicated with equal industry and intelligent methods by others. But there is a magic in the combination of soil and sunshine and showers that make possible the growing of the highest quality product the world can show in this field.

One more point: There is no monopoly in this field; nor any secret. Only hard work is needed to succeed in the celery industry here; hard work and horse sense.

The pioneers have made a lot of progress, but they are ready to share their knowledge with any comer who desires to engage in the industry.

lar industry annually, and headed for the ten million mark— Going up the line on the surest possible route; going up on the merits of a quality produce. Nothing can stop its progress on such a route. Chris J. Kovitz refuses to give up the office of city attorney; holds that the council could not legally elect one of its members. That's easy, Mr. Williams is not now a member, and the council can simply elect him again at its next meeting. There are a lot of big things to be done, from the municipal water supply proposition on down the line, and Salem cannot afford to have any delay in quibbles. Some of the flax growers are asking for a revision of the rates of payment by the state and the private companies for their product. It is to be hoped that everything may be ironed out quickly, and so that no injustices may be done on either side. We are at an important place in the history of the industry. J. Sidney Starling is in Oregon, from East Tonawanda, New York. He represents Robert Simpson of New Jersey, who owns the linen-mill machinery that was brought to Vancouver, Wash., and which is lying idle, on account of difficulties of the company that undertook to finance a linen mill there. If Mr. Simpson had made Salem connections he would not likely have gotten into such difficulties. Mr. Starling is an old linen manufacturer. Salem is the place for linen mills, at the present stage of the industry. In the Slogan pages of this morning the reader will see that the celery and lettuce growers of the Labish district are preparing to erect a store building on the east side of the Pacific highway, a few rods north of the Chiemawa four corners, near the Kletzing place. This store is to be ready for the coming season and is to be used for the sale of celery and lettuce and other vegetables grown on the Labish beaver dam lands. This will make a very attractive showing, and it will accommodate the thousands of people who use the highway, as well as advertise the high quality of the vegetable products of that district. Photographs illustrating the Celery Slogan issue on page eight are used by courtesy of C. V. Ashbaugh, Brooks, Or. Betty at first was unwilling to believe that Durkin was married, but when she became convinced of the truth she expressed her intention of "doing some talking myself." The state's attorney's office is considering using her as a state witness against the sheik gunman. Miss Harriet Gallow, Durkin's Brooklyn cousin, tonight revealed how the gunman, who according to the police, went about wearing an iron vest to protect himself, actually masqueraded as a woman by day and a man at night after the Shanahan killing. He went to New York, was furnished with a complete outfit of woman's clothing, even to a vanity case, and calmly powdered his nose while the police were questioning Miss Gallow, in the same room, she said. On a trip back to Chicago, she said, he had worn woman's clothing in the day time, and had deliberately asked questions of officers along the way and made sport of pictures of him advertising a reward for his capture.

St. Louis. With Durkin when he arrived here was his 18-year-old bride, daughter of the village blacksmith of Cornell, Ill., and waiting to face him was a grim young woman who has vowed vengeance because he jilted her. The latter is Betty Werner, for whom Durkin returned to Chicago last October after he had shot Edward Shanahan, department of justice agent who tried to arrest him for stealing an automobile. Durkin had planned to flee with Betty and her child and walked into a police trap when he went to the home of her uncle, Lloyds Austin. It was here that Sergeant Gray was shot while Austin was also killed in the general firing as Betty tried to help her lover escape. Betty at first was unwilling to believe that Durkin was married, but when she became convinced of the truth she expressed her intention of "doing some talking myself." The state's attorney's office is considering using her as a state witness against the sheik gunman. Miss Harriet Gallow, Durkin's Brooklyn cousin, tonight revealed how the gunman, who according to the police, went about wearing an iron vest to protect himself, actually masqueraded as a woman by day and a man at night after the Shanahan killing. (Continued from page 1) arm. Dowd seized him around the waist and both began to drag him from the room. "Durkin, we've got you," Dowd said. "We've got you at last." "You've made a mistake. I'm Valentine," the gunman protested, trying to pull away. "Valentine?" Dowd replied, shoving him into a seat. "I'd know you in a million Durkin." The prisoner then admitted his identity. Durkin was taken before Chief of Detective Kaiser to whom he talked freely. He admitted killing Shanahan, but denied firing the shots which killed Gray and Austin. "Oh, those fellows were shooting at each other half the time," Durkin related, that after his last escape he went to New York and in all returned to Chicago four times. He said he stole automobiles in New York, Detroit and Chicago to make the various trips and finally drove to Cornell, where he got Miss Sullivan and drove to East
