this winter are making progress more difficult than anticipated," Wilkins said. "I admit there is danger of the supply train falling through the ice o fthe Tanana river. However, the snow motors are not an esential part of the expedition, though they will be a great help if successful."

Captain Wilkins said that the expedition would not expect to 'live off the country" unless the planes landed outside the three mile limit in the Arctic ocean, and therefore the explorers would not be involved in a conflict with Alaska game laws. "The only permit we asked of the biological survey," Wilkins asserted, "was for collecting scientific specimens near Point Barrow in case we are delayed there long."

The planes, lashed to the deck of the steamship Victoria have stood the voyage so far well.
