TWENTY-SEVEN

Miss Johnstone was called to the telephone while the members of John Ingate's party were having their tea. Three pairs of eyes watched her disappear inside, and it cannot be said that any pair was more fascinated than the others. For Miss Johnstone captured women's interest as surely as men's.

Jocelyn Johnstone was the name that Gertrude Greenhalter took when she entered the chorus of the "Stupidities of 1924." She was a saleswoman at Gimbels, New York, then, a blonde creature, faun-like, with perfect teeth and divining, mysterious smile. Not, however, until she had learned to walk (who has not noticed the superb carriage of the women in the shows put on by the producer of "Stupidities" of this year and that?) and to dress so that her every good point was emphasized and her bad ones shadowed, that she became the fascinating figure so well known in the New York night clubs until Reggie White had the bad judgment to decide upon a close friend of the commissioner of police as a blackmail prospect.

Miss Johnstone and Mr. White were laying low in Chicago now, after a season in Florida, which also had gotten too hot for them. It had not been difficult for Mr. White to insinuate himself into the Mohawk country club.

"You'd better look out, John," Clay laughed, "or you'll be on a honeymoon, too."

The host colored slightly as he smiled. He realized suddenly that his interest in Miss Johnstone must be rather apparent. He glanced slyly at Eve. It was not difficult for him to discern the state of her feelings. She was married to Clay Wales, on her honeymoon, but she still loved him a little—a great deal, perhaps. The thought gave him a sense of satisfaction. He hoped she was already a little sorry she had turned him down in favor of Clay.

Very interesting was the conversation Miss Johnstone was having inside the clubhouse, in a telephone booth.

"John Ingate is the guy with the money. He's from Central City. He's a wholesale leather no claim upon him now, even if, despite herself, she did love him. She tried to get the pair out of her head, but couldn't. Yesterday it was Clay that Miss Johnstone had centered her attentions upon; today it was John. She was a flirt, that was all, a woman who wanted men to pay her attentions, the kind of woman who didn't care anything about any man. John Ingate would fall in love with her and get a broken heart for his pains. So she told herself.

Back in the lobby again, she stole with Clay to a window from which they could see John Ingate apparently very deeply interested in conversation with the violet-eyed one. "We'll go out the side way and slip down to the interurban." Eve whispered, her heart beating uncertainly.

Clay didn't care whether the pair saw them leave. In fact he was in a mind to take Eve's arm and lead her, willingly or unwillingly, out by the front walk. He was exultant over this scene. Today's happenings, he thought, would banish any of Eve's old feeling for John Ingate. He was not a discerning man, and he didn't know the sort of thing that makes women indifferent, and what it is that makes them jealous and aggressive.

Does John Ingate become a victim of Miss Johnstone's wiles? What does Eve do to prevent it? See the next instalment of this story.

LIVING and LOVING

"Do as You Please!"

"Who is he?" questioningly carols a star in a popular musical comedy. And a letter we received this morning from a reader who signs herself "Puzzled Mother," causes us to wonder just "what is what?" We quote the paragraphs that stirred us:

"My daughter is sixteen, and every one says she is sweet and pretty—nobody but myself guesses that she is vain, untruthful, selfish and utterly unreliable. It is because I must ask advice of some one that I turn to you, for, of course, I could not speak of this to any who know us. You see, in a way my daughter is the result of our experiment, and I feel that I, her mother, in no small measure am to blame for the flaws in her character. I've always been an inveterate reader and when my baby came I determined to put into practice the knowledge I had acquired. I wanted my daughter to be the living exponent of the theory of self-expression. So from her babyhood I took great care never to thwart her will whenever safety did not demand it. As soon as she was old enough to notice clothes at all I took her with me to the shops and let her select her own diminutive hats and frocks. When school days arrived she picked out the school to which she went. She was given free access to the library shelves and read what books she would. With the

Miss Johnstone smiled sweetly. "But I'm so commonplace in grimy clothing, and you're so charming."

There was just a little beam of appreciation about Eve's eyes at the remark. "I think it's the other way around." She responded quickly, getting up. "You'll have to excuse me now."

Clay followed her into the clubhouse, and Miss Johnstone and John Ingate were left alone.

"Well, it looks like Mister Ingate has found a lovely little playmate," said Clay, suggestively.

Eve managed a smile. "Yes, a romance under our very eyes."

"I think we'd better do a fade out. You must get a headache or something."

"Yes, I think so, too," she replied, but not without a trace of sadness.

She idled through her dressing, taken up with her thoughts. She was ashamed of herself for feeling so badly over this. She had theater it was the same—she saw good plays and poor plays, uncensored. When only 14 she began to desire the company of the young boys of the neighborhood, and beyond finding out who they were and the sort of families they came from I did nothing to limit her circle of friends. I feared a chaperon would rouse in her an element of suspicion.

"I thought I was right, and now I am sure I was wrong. My experiment has turned out a failure. The love and the trust that I gave her, honestly believing these would help her to develop self-reliance, candor, sanity, sophistication and a well rounded sense of values, have betrayed my child to her undoing. My daughter is spending every penny she can get hold of upon her clothes; she has played hookey from school until she is now suspended; she refuses to listen to my advice upon a thing—even lies to me upon occasions. In short, she is 'running wild'—staying out late with companions of whom I do not approve. If she keeps up this sort of thing, only the worst can happen. I must do something to check her reckless, wilful pace. Can you tell me what?"

Inconsistency, thy name is mortal! If an engineer for the whole of 16 years had never once tested his brakes, how could he expect to stop a train heading, at full speed, down hill? We wish we could help you, mother, but we are afraid we can't. Only this one thing have we to suggest: Have a talk with your daughter; tell her of your aspirations for her. Don't blame her, but let her know that she is exactly what you made her—the product of your pride and possibly mistaken ambition. Tell her why you allowed her the liberty you did. Ask her not to renounce it, but to be careful not to let it run into license. Reason will work wonders. If in this case it will not serve to bring you and your daughter into closer communication and understanding we are afraid nothing will!
