University of Oregon Student Makes Survey of Oregon Writers

UNIVERSITY OF OREGON, Eugene, June 12.—(Special.)—While there is no self-conscious literary group or movement in Oregon, there are a number of fiction writers who have achieved national recognition, Oregon, being a young state, is producing a youngful literature, according to W. F. G. Thatcher, professor of journalism and English, who has taught a number of outstanding writers of the state today.

"Until we develop a culture, in the sociological sense of the word, we will probably have no indigenous literature, that is, a literature which has common characteristics. With the development of our economic life, and consequent prosperity, this will probably come about. Being in an isolated geographical and intellectual position, we will probably develop a literary group with definite characteristics of its own," Professor Thatcher pointed out.

Edison Marshal, of Medford, a vigorous robust, lovable person, is undoubtedly one of the outstanding Oregon writers. He is now writing a novel dealing with Oregon, Alaska and the Canadian northwest. Robert Case of Portland, is one of the rising short story writers. Ernest J. Haycox, of Silverton, and Nancy Wilson of Olympia, Wash., both of whom are in New York, are doing excellent work in the short story field. All of these are former University of Oregon students.

Charles Alexander, of Albany, has won considerable in novel writing, his fiction dealing mainly with the out-of-doors and animals. A Richard Wetjen of Salem, is foremost among the short story writers. His stories are mainly about the sea.

Alexander Hull of Newberg, combines literature with music for a livelihood. He has contributed to some of the best magazines. Vivian Bretherton, of Portland, has published her short stories in a number of the best women's magazines.

Anne Shannon Monroe of Portland, has won recognition by her novels of the Oregon country. A newcomer is T. A. Harper of Portland who is doing fiction, some of which is after the style of fantasy.

"Although there is no special far-western literary school, the middle west has a group of writers with common characteristics, represented by Willa Cather, Sherwood Anderson, Sinclair Lewis, and others." Professor Thatcher said, "who write realistically and critically of their milieu."

"In the far west we haven't reached that state. Those writers who have been nationally recognized have written romantically and historically. Our society is only one jump ahead of the pioneer stage. We are in the romantic period. While this is a natural and healthful condition, we will probably develop into the critical, realistic stage because it would be the natural organic development of our culture."

At present, according to Professor Thatcher, there is a lull in American fiction. No writer during the past year seems to have made a great impression, and the question now is: What will be the next development?

He has taken quarters in the Burnett Jewelry Store.

We are glad and proud to introduce all our friends to him. We shall be happy to meet all his friends and patients.

If you have a suspicion that your eyes are not as good as they used to be—if occasionally the print in the newspaper blurs—if in driving you have an occasional "narrow squeak" because you "didn't see the other car" it will be a good plan to confer with Dr. Bates.

A conference with the Doctor will not obligate you in any way.

Nobody will tease you to spend any money. But if you need glasses—you will be certain to get them fitted correctly—and if you desire—you may pay the bill in small sums—weekly or monthly as may be most convenient for you.
