ELIOT FUNERAL WILL BE HELD ON TUESDAY

the first Harvard athletic team, for which crimson was adopted as the university color. Until comparatively recently he had continued a lifelong habit of giving views on public questions. He was in his nineties when he took issue with Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia university, on the merits of prohibition. Dr. Eliot revealing that he had become a teetotaler at the age of 83, praised the Volstead act.

There will be funeral services here Tuesday and in Appleton chapel, Harvard university, on Wednesday.

Born in Boston in the administration of Andrew Jackson, Eliot became president at Harvard at the age of 35 and lived to survive all but two of the 28 presidents of the United States who were his contemporaries.

His administration was featured by development of an elective system, which has since been adopted extensively by other colleges.

Throughout his life he was an active participant in discussion of public affairs. His views were sought on many questions. Often his pronouncements made him a target for bitter personal attacks.

His attitudes were characterized by vigor, but were by no means inelastic, as was shown when, after denouncing football in 1906, "as a spectacle more brutalizing than prize fighting, cock fighting or bull fighting," he later saw Harvard play Carlisle and praised improvements under changed rules.

When Harvard was considering race distinction of candidates he declared: "I am opposed to every form of racial discrimination in the universities of our heterogeneous democracy."

In a discussion on "Religion of the Future," he said: "The fear of hell has not proved effective to deter man from going to hell, and heaven never has been described in terms very attractive to the average man or woman."

He aroused a storm in labor circles when he asserted that the "scab" is a "good type of American hero," and that democracy must profoundly distrust the labor union's too frequent effort to restrict the efficiency and output of the industrial workman.

"During the war he maintained 'the hope of the world lies in complete cooperation between the British empire and the United States.'"

Puritans found little favor with him. "They took the joy out of work and life," he once wrote.

He was an ardent foe of liquor and predicted there would be no modification of the Volstead act "in the wrong direction." He caused a stir when he said: "Whoever is familiar with the genealogies of the New England families that have come down from the 17th century knows that the common cause for the decline or extinction of those families has been the abuses of intoxicating liquors by their young men."

His stand on the immigration question was summed up in a speech as follows: "We were all foreigners a little while ago. His recipe for longevity was a "sound constitution never impaired by any serious disease or accident; a calm temperament expecting of food; the habit of taking daily exercise in open air; moderation in eating."

"Exercise should be taken regularly, though always in moderation," he advised. "One of the chief objections I have to the competitive games so popular nowadays is that they tend to over-exercise the player."

Dr. Eliot was a prolific author on subjects ranging from treatises on educational methods to text books on chemical subjects.

He was described as the best orator of the generation that followed Wendell Phillips. Although he resigned to make way for a younger and more "active" man, Dr. Eliot's own activities and his fame seemed to grow rather than diminish after he had quitted the presidential chair. He plunged into literary work. It was then that he drew up the list of books which he said would constitute a library, which, if mastered, would make any man well read. It has since been called the

"Five-foot shelf."

An independent in politics, Dr. Eliot was a strong supporter of Woodrow Wilson and the League of Nations. He voted the democratic ticket in the past two national elections.

By Martin Fereshtetian

"The First Citizen of America" has passed into the larger life, and in that passing, the Unitarian church has to be prayerfully thankful that one of its members, the president of several of its national conferences, has lived such a life and contributed so much to the intellectual, moral and religious life of the world that he was recognized by those in position to know as one who had done most for the character of American civilization.

Dr. Charles William Eliot was the typical gentleman. He was scholarly, liberal, individualistic, thoroughly spiritual and the best exponent of democracy in the world. He was a worthy representative of American Unitarianism and carried the mantle of honor which had been so ably worn by Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, William Cullen Bryant, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Emerson, Chief Justice Marshall and a host of others. He typified the flower of western civilization.

Much will be written as to Dr. Eliot's contribution to education. It was he who made academic freedom a real, practical thing rather than a high sounding phrase. When John Fiske, the great historian found himself in difficulties because of his exposition of the theory of evolution in a certain university, it was Dr. Eliot who offered Fiske a chair at Harvard which was recognized and is now known to be a school where men dare think and seek the truth without fear or favor.

Dr. Eliot preached many times from Unitarian pulpits and one of the happiest moments of my life was given when his minister, Dr. Samuel McChord Crothers introduced me to Dr. Eliot some years ago when I was at Cambridge.

My first recollection of Dr. Eliot goes to 1913 when at Buffalo, N. Y., he presided at the Unitarian conference. The last time I saw him was five years ago in his rose-garden in Cambridge. I had been told that the venerable doctor did not see many people. However my enthusiasm got the better of me. I had visited Emerson's home. I had sat in the chapel where the immortal Emerson had preached his wonderful "Divinity School Address," and I was not going to be cheated after being in Cambridge from far away Salem, Oregon.

So while my friends were enjoying the beauties of Boston harbor, I ambled to the Rose Garden and there saw Dr. Eliot, the first citizen of America and chatted with him. After a few moments chatting with him, he asked me to wait as he had an errand to do, and so I waited to walk to the heart of Cambridge with the ex-president of Harvard; the man honored by all civilized nations carrying a bundle which he told me was a pair of shoes which needed mending!

As long as such men are born to the world, man need not lose hope that in time the Golden Rule of Jesus will become the active power which will propel civilization onward and upward forever.

But that will not be too many. It will be enough, when the people of the Willamette valley and the coast counties fully realize that practically every acre of land they have is more or less acid, and needs lime to make it sweet—and that the use of lime will pay its cost many times over, in increased crops of every single kind, directly or indirectly—most of them directly.

But it would not be a very great step to put in another lime plant there, or to double the capacity of the one now there.

There is soon to be printed a new lime circular, for general distribution from the prison office. The facts for it are being assembled and whipped into shape.

FOUR CARS IN TANGLE

SOMETHING NEW IN TRAFFIC ACCIDENTS REPORTED

Occasionally two cars collide, and sometimes three, but Sunday a new record was set when four cars collided at 22nd and State streets, according to a report made by John Riley, at police headquarters yesterday.

A procession of cars was going down the street, according to Riley's statement, when the car in the lead suddenly stopped. The cars following did a neat job of bumping into one another, and according to the report, no damage resulted from the many sided collision.
