MARSHALL NEILAN PLAY AT OREGON

'Wild Oats Lane' With Viola Dana and Robert Agnew Starts Today

Marshall Neilan's fine production, "Wild Oats Lane," which starts at the Oregon theater today and will show Monday and Tuesday, is a vivid story which looks you squarely in the eye, and pointing an accusing finger, asks: "Are you this way?"

Are you the type of father who does not understand your daughter, and thereby shower misfortune and shame upon her by failing to hold out a helping hand to her in her plight?

Are you the docile type of mother who pines for your child, yet believes in her and through your great belief brings her through the mire?

Are you the type of crook that is wholly bad, as the dude is, or have you a spark of fitness like the gangster, buried deeply, but there just the same?

Are you at heart a splendid youth, a victim of circumstances with apparently all the world against you?

Are you the misunderstood girl, utterly lacking courage and dragged to the depths, thereby?

"Wild Oats Lane" was adapted by Benjamin Glazer from the stage play by George Broadhurst and the story, "The Gambling Chaplain," by Gerald Beaumont.

George Barnum plays the father; Margaret Seddon the mother; Jerry Milley the dude; Eddie James the gangster; Bobby Agnew the youth; and Viola Dana the girl.

John P. MacSweeney portrays the priest, a most unusual character. Robert Brower is the kleptomaniac. Scott Welch the detective, and Mitchell Lewis the bum.
