TUNNEY SOCKS WAY TO WORLD CHAMPIONSHIP

victories over Jess Willard, Georges Carpentier, and Louis Firpo. Gene was the devastating punch, the furious aggressiveness that marked him as one of the most feared men in the ring.

Instead, he seemed in a daze from the start, unable at any time to sustain his attack for more than a few seconds. Occasionally, he connected with long left or right hooks to the head and body, but these no more than jarred the challenger temporarily. Always Tunney came back, punching with rights and lefts from the shoulder, rocking Dempsey's head with short but powerful punches.

It was Tunney's terrific right hand blows to the head, chin and ribs that decided the battle. This blow delivered like a ramrod, broke up Dempsey's rushes, opened cuts about his face and finally, in the last round, closed his left eye completely.

Dempsey was a sorry sight in the final round as Tunney, realizing victory and the goal of his fighting career was in his grasp, threw caution to the winds and lashed the champion about the ring.

Gamely, Dempsey, weaving and bobbing, bored in, but he only succeeded in taking a steady stream of punishment. One eye closed, blood dripped from a gash under the title holder's right eye, his mouth was cut and he was reeling, his knees wobbly under the furious shower of Tunney's attack.

Desperately as Tunney tried, however, he could not bring Dempsey down. The champion, as he had done throughout the fight, absorbed his beating without giving much ground. In a final wild salley, he called his own guns into play, the weapons that had knocked out most of the men he ever faced, but this time they weren't loaded.

The crowd gave Tunney a tumultuous ovation before the judge's decision was announced. There was no doubt as to what it would be. Dozens of the more enthusiastic climbed into the ring, a squad of police had to clear it so that the announcer could make known the formal decision.

Tunney won eight of the 10 rounds by so decisive a margin that no doubt was left of his supremacy, the Associated Press score sheets showed. None of the rounds were scored for the champion and only in the sixth and seventh was he conceded better than an even break. In both of these, it was more a case of Tunney's cautiousness than Dempsey's own attacking success that affected the scoring.

But for his hesitancy to open up and put all his guns into action, Tunney might have won by a knockout or scored an even more decisive victory. The challenger was cautious at first because he feared Dempsey was holding back, purposely shifting his customary rushing tactics to upset the Marine's plan of battle, but Tunney found a ready mark for his blows and as he discovered himself outpunching Dempsey consistently at close and long range, he became more aggressive and more confident.

His confidence grew as the battle progressed through the drenching downpour, but Tunney always was a bit wary. Now and then, in such rounds as the fourth, sixth and seventh, Dempsey connected with solid smashes to the head, driving in with a flash of his old ferocity. But the spark soon faded from these outbursts.

The champion's downfall and the disappointment in his showing was reminiscent of the defeat of James J. Jeffries by Jack Johnson in the first heavyweight battle Tex Rickard ever promoted. In 1910, Dempsey, like Jeffries, went into the ring a big favorite, only to exhibit little championship fighting qualities. Chiefly because of Dempsey's lethargy and Tunney's intermittent cautiousness, the bout had few thrills, few spectaclar moments of the sort that have punctuated most of Dempsey's battles since he dethroned Willard on July 4, 1919.

There were no knockdowns nor the semblance of an except for one or two occasions when the fighters each slipped on the soaked and slippery surface of the ring.

Tunney was in command from the start. Before the bell had ended the first round, with the crowd amazed at Dempsey's slowness, the challenger had begun to seize his opportunities. As the champion swung wildly, the former marine worked in his left jab and crossed with solid rights that shook Dempsey up.

From then on, with monotonous regularity, Tunney beat off Dempsey's rushes with jolting blows to the head and body. The challenger gave ground more often than Dempsey, but it was for scientific purposes—not because he was receiving much punishment. Tunney's right eye was cut in one round, the seventh, and blood flowed from the re-opening of cuts on his lips, but these did not bother him to any extent. He took Dempsey's stiffest punches without flinching, and ducked or blocked most of the others.

Tex Rickard's weather luck finally failed for the first time since he began promoting boxing's biggest spectacles, but the soaked tens of thousands, including many women, refused to leave their seats. Many had come prepared, but the big majority took their drenching smilingly and stuck to the finish to cheer the advent of a new reign in pugilism.

The rain started lightly at first, shortly after Dempsey and Tunney entered the ring. During an unusually long delay, caused by the taping of their hands, it increased in intensity. By the time the final bell sounded, the two gladiators were spattered by solid sheets of water. Tunney's gloves, soaked and crimson with Dempsey's blood, literally splashed their way to victory.

Gene Tunney's smile, laid aside for a thin-lipped look of determination during his victorious fight, returned as he left the ring, and almost mobbed by a wildly enthusiastic group of friends and handlers.

"I am naturally gratified," was the first comment of the studious ex-marine. "I knew soon after the start that I was the champion's master. I fought a carefully planned battle, and it succeeded to the fondest of my expectations. Dempsey was game. He gave me trouble, but I was never doubtful of the outcome."

Dempsey declared: "It's the old story. The best man won. I have no alibis. Give all the credit to Gene. He's a great champion."

The champion, badly battered as he was, rushed from his corner after the announcement of the decision and embraced Tunney in the middle of the ring.
