

Hillman's "Iron Fireman" Heats New Store Building

Automatic Device, Rapidly Finding Favor in Salem and Vicinity, Will Keep Temperature Steady Without Trouble

The ingenuity of Salem inventors is represented in at least one feature of the new Bligh building. In connection with the heating plant, in the basement under the theatre, the Hillman "iron fireman," and automatic stoker, is installed. This is the invention of Adolph and Otto Hillman, partners in the Hillman Fuel Co.

The person tending the furnace has little to do other than to fill the hopper and to clean out the ashes. After the hopper is filled with coal, the feeding is controlled by an electric thermostat, which turns on the feed when the heat goes below a certain figure, and turns it off when it goes above. The device is adjustable so that any one of a variety of degrees of heat may be maintained.

Otto Hillman, of the Hillman Fuel Co., expressly requests permission to congratulate Frank Bligh on the opening of his Capitol theatre.

"Every convenience for patrons has been provided, and the opening is of outstanding importance to the city," he states.

The same consideration which was given to decorations and ventilating has resulted in the installation of the most modern and reliable heating plant manufactured, the "Iron Fireman," now serving successfully in the following buildings: new YMCA, New Salem Hotel, Bligh Hotel, Gray Belle, Roth Grocery Co., YWCA, Engle Apartments, Valley Motor Co. building, all in Salem; and five buildings of the Oregon Normal school at Monmouth.

It has full electrical automatic control. A similar device for household use, with automatic ash disposal, is being introduced by the Hillman Fuel Co.

Mangis and Ellis Secure Adjoining Offices Here

Well Known Insurance Man and Attorney Locate in Extreme Northwest Corner in Order to Face on Both High and State

Adjoining offices on the second floor of the new Bligh building will be occupied by Fred E. Mangis, well known local insurance man, and William Ellis, attorney, in the extreme northwest corner so that they face on both High and State streets.

Mangis is a Salem boy, having come here from Illinois when six years of age. After spending several years in California he returned to Salem in 1914 and organized the firm of Mangis Brothers, fruit brokers, of which he is the head. Except for a period during the war, he has been in business here since that time. In 1923 the partnership with his brother was dissolved, and Mangis has been engaged in the insurance business since that time.

William P. Ellis is resuming private practice after serving as attorney for the public service commission for the past 12 years. He will continue, however, a part time connection with the public service department, and is also a deputy of the attorney general's office. In his private practice he will specialize in public utility work.

One of the new business firms which comes to Salem along with the completion of the new Bligh building, is the Hamilton Shoe company, handling ladies' shoes exclusively, which opened Saturday morning in attractive quarters on the west side of the building, facing High street.

Hamilton, president of the company putting in this store, is also associated in the management of five other stores of the same name in the northwest: at Eugene, Seattle, Tacoma, Spokane and Aberdeen. Nevertheless, the Salem store is a separate corporation and strictly a Salem business, Hamilton points out. It is under the direct management of T. H. Challman, who has recently brought his family here to reside. Hamilton's headquarters are in Seattle.

ates the character of Russia's most powerful banker, who is charmed by the beauty of the dancer. Sinister and licentious, the banker seeks to gain the girl for his own purposes in much the same brutal manner in which he amassed his large fortune. Siegmann's villainy is an art in itself, made more impressive because of the lavish surroundings in which he acts out his part.

The cast also numbers such well-known players as Arthur Hoyt, who is Siegmann's right-hand man in his villainy, and Earl Metcalf, who plays the nihilist brother of the hero; Mikhael Vavitch, Nickolo Soussaanin and Medea Radzina, three of Russia's foremost players; Cesare Gravina, noted Italian actor, Nina Romano, one of the most beautiful women on the screen; Victor De Linsky, William Von Hardenberg and Charles Hancock.

was located at the present site of the Pomeroy & Keene store.

Two years later the Blighs opened the "Klinger-Grand" theatre where the Atlas book store is now conducted, and the same year, started the "Liberty" at Roseburg. The "Majestic" at Corvallis was opened in 1911, and the "Bligh", which is now the "Globe", in Albany.

The "Grand" and "Ye Liberty" theatres in Salem were operated under the Bligh management for a time, and residents of Salem who were here then will easily recall that no first class road show passed up or down the coast without stopping for a performance in Salem, and that all of the bigger motion pictures also were shown here.

With the opening of Bligh's new Capitol, provision is made for resumption of that policy of giving Salem the best entertainment that is available.

"VISION" BLIGH'S CAPITOL THEATRE

"Your old men shall dream dreams and your young men shall see visions."

Mr. Bligh had a vision:—He saw Salem in 1930 a metropolitan city. He saw a Capitol Theatre, in that Capital City, second to none in the Northwest.

To bring to pass the thing he envisioned he called in Tourtellotte & Hummel, Architects, who co-operated with him in making a realistic picture of that Theatre. From that picture (plans) Builders, Workmen, and Decorators wrought in enduring masonry the Monumental Building which becomes a part of the new Salem today. Its service will be the giving of pleasure and optimism to all the good people of the Capital and inspiring other property owners to go and do likewise.
