Fine Breads from fine flours grow

No matter how skilled the baker, really fine breads must have their beginning in dependable flour. Long ago commercial bakers came to that conclusion. Producing thousands of loaves each day called for organization to banish uncertainties, else how would they be uniform day-in and day-out in color, texture and flavor? Little chance had Mr. Baker to excuse himself by saying: "I had a little bad luck with the batch today."

So the bakers took the "luck" out of their business. One of the first things they did was to select their flours to meet laboratory tests for uniformity.

Housewives cannot be bothered with testing laboratories in their homes, nor is there need, since they have learned to buy flour by brand name. That is why Fisher's Blend Brand Flour has become standard for household use—it is the same today, as last month, as ten years ago.

What the Los Angeles newspapers said about Williams Midgets while playing the Hillstreet-Orpheum theater:

RECORD:
And then there were Williams Midgets, little chaps in halpint sizes who rumped about eager to show what their little bodies could do in the way of acrobatics and dancing. They less about 13 inches long doing the Charleston. One of the little chaps defied every law of equilibrium by balancing on the pate of brawny Williams, singing and drinking a glass of water while in this precarious pose.

HERALD:
The Midgets are a circus in themselves, offering songs, dances and acrobatics. The Charleston, done in miniature brought forth a popular reaction from the large audience. The act is novel and entertaining throughout.
