CONGRESS BUSY WHEN GAVELS OPEN SESSION

...were introduced in the senate, however, the deluge of prospective legislative acts became almost at the instant the body called to order. Several dozen of their way into the hopper...

...representative Dickinson, republican, Iowa, for locating a summer White House west of the Mississippi river, while another by Representative Brand, democrat of Georgia, would authorize an appropriation of $50,000,000 to guarantee against bank failure deposits in national banks throughout the country.

...Galleries of both houses filled early and the chatter of the women spectators added to the din that arose from the floor. All available space was filled with the exception of the senate diplomatic gallery, where only a handful had gathered, and the presidential and diplomatic galleries in the house which were entirely empty.

...Speaker Longworth received warm applause when he stepped to the rostrum in the house, but the crowd in the senate carefully observed the rules and accorded no demonstration to Vice President Dawes as he took his place on the dais.

...The senate session was short but tense, while that in the house was more protracted due principally to the nearly 30 minutes required to call the long roll of 435 members. Then, too, in the house the members were more prone to talk, and the speaker once was forced to pound for order until the blood mounted to his cheeks.

...Mrs. Alice Roosevelt Longworth, wife of the speaker, was present in the gallery with a party of friends, while Attorney General Sargent and Dwight W. Davis, secretary of war, were on the floor. Secretary Kellogg was present in the senate.

...The senate is expected to take up some legislative work tomorrow, while the house will adjourn, after reading of the message, out of respect to the memory of its former speaker, "Uncle Joe" Cannon, of Illinois.

TENS OF THOUSANDS SEE SANTA PARADE WITH REINDEER

...as he arrived. They all liked very much, and even the children went up to feel the soft and sharp horns of Dancer and cheer, who stood patiently by like the good, tame reindeers that they are.

The girls greeted Santa with laughter, and much shouting, and gave him three big cheers as he departed with the promise to come again next year.

Dancer and Prancer next brought the sleigh to a stop in the big courtyard of the boys training school, and the whole populace of the hilltop came swarming out to greet him.

Santa's coming soon was known all over the nearby countryside, and the boys and girls in a little public school that nestled in the valley at the foot of the hill all rushed out of doors and came running up the hill to see their dear old saint. Santa could not stay long, however, and soon Dancer and Prancer were flying through the air toward the state tuberculosis hospital, bearing Santa and Skookluxe.

Santa made a big hit at the tuberculosis hospital. Even the nurses liked him, and led him all over the many buildings to bring happiness to all the little tuberculosis patients who could not get out of bed, but who were still anxious to see the famous Yuletide Saint.

After a long visit there, in which everyone from the doctors and nurses down to the tiniest tot fell in love with him, Santa again boarded the sleigh, Skookluxe climbed in beside him, cracked the whip, and Dancer and Prancer took off for the school for the day.

The little deaf boys and girls could not hear Santa's greeting to them, so J. Lyman Steed, superintendent of the school, translated it into sign language for them, and the children showed their glee in a silent and orderly manner, not like the racket with which many boys and girls display joy.

Dancer and Prancer were soon bearing their precious burden on their way, and the sleigh with its jingling bells next landed at the big Salem Indian school in Chemawa. All the Indian boys and girls, 1000 strong, came rushing out toward Santa.

Did the merry old saint turn and run when he saw all these Indians coming, apparently on the warpath? He did not. He knows that the days of the warpath are long since gone, and that these little Indian children wanted to welcome him just as much as their white brothers and sisters did. And they surely gave him a royal welcome. The tears streamed down Santa's kindly old weather-beaten face at the love his little red friends showed for him.

They swarmed all over, and he had difficulty in going from building to building because of the huge multitude. He visited the "white place," even going into the hospital where the little sick Indians turned up their big black eyes to stare at him in joyful wonder.

After that Santa, Skookluxe, Dancer and Prancer all disappeared into some distant fairyland until after lunch time, for he did not want to keep his little Salem friends from enjoying their dinners at their regular dinner-time.

But promptly at 1:30 o'clock, a horde of children in Marion square found Prancer, Dancer, and Skookluxe awaiting him beneath the trees. Santa soon appeared from no one knows where, and was almost overwhelmed by the big stampedede of little children, big children, and even grown folks, who all crowded round, anxious for even a chance to touch the coat of the jolly old saint who brings the Yuletide cheer.

Soon the parade started. And what a parade it was! Its like has never been seen around these parts since the winter of the dark blue snow. Issuing from the dark and sombre depths of the grove of fir trees, Santa rode majestically in the sleigh behind Dancer and Prancer, and was led by a big policeman on a motorcycle to keep the crowds away.

And behind him, with more policemen to protect them, came all the little children, big children, and grown ups who had awaited his coming. On foot, in wagons, in automobiles, and in baby carriages, they streamed after him through the city, cheering loudly for their beloved saint.

And the letters! Santa had a big mail pouch with him, and before the parade was over it had been filled to overflowing with letters, hundreds of them, from children all over the city. They expressed all kinds of wishes, but practically all showed the true spirit of Christmas by making some wish for some one else.

Santa will consider the letters, and the children who made the unselfish wishes will probably get much more consideration from the just old saint than the ones who wished presents only for themselves.

The parade ended with a big reception, back under the fir trees of Marion square. Five thousand children and grown ups gathered round him. The little babies in arms were even brought close by their mothers so they could touch the white beard and pat the smiling face of their beloved friend.

And when all had been completed, and the low winter sun drew nearer and nearer to the western horizon, Santa mounted his sleigh, cracked his whip, and Dancer and Prancer were off, bearing Santa and Skookluxe away.
