When the storm has subsided the intake commences. For 12 to 24 hours after the well stops "blowing" this continues apparently until an equilibrium has been reached. One theory offered by geologists By Ed Wheelan who have studied the well is that the shaft connects with several local pockets or chambers containing air of a temperature and pressure approximately constant, This air, they hold, flows in or out of the well as the surface pressure becomes higher or lower than that in the underground passageways. The long periods of activity are accounted for by the throttling effect of the small brifice through which the air must pass,
