

SIDE LIGHTS OF THE STAGE and SCREEN

Oregon Theater

There is not a person who is familiar at all with picture plays who does not know of Ronald Coleman's rapid rise to the very pinnacle of fame through his exceptional work in such pictures as "The Dark Angel," "Stella Dallas" and "Beau Geste." He is today the commonly accepted favorite of the screen—a favorite who came into his own through sterling worth and unusual talent.

In "The Night of Love" United Artists mammoth production which has just closed an extended run at the Columbia at Portland and to open at the Oregon today, Ronald Coleman reaches the height of his screen career. No actor on the silver sheet today can approach this young man in intensity of feeling, in realism to actual life. No gnashing of teeth or waving of hands are necessary for this star to put powerful emotion into his scenes. Coleman is living his part with a directness and depth that cannot fail to reach the heartstrings of any audience.

Nothing was spared in the making of "The Night of Love" that should go into a master picture. Expense was not considered—the result only was the goal and the picture bears out the confidence the producers placed in it. With beautiful Vilma Banky playing opposite the star, with the best supporting talent available and under expert direction, the finished product is truly a masterpiece.

Elsinore Theater
The vaudeville offering at the Elsinore today holds five unusually entertaining feature acts.

There is a certain fascination about the work of a really clever quartette especially when combined with rich harmony of well trained voices there is a vein of humor. Joe Jenny and his famous comedy four hit the top mark in this kind of entertainment and have been headlined over every big vaudeville circuit in America.

As a diversion there is a classic comedy skit, by the Lessig-Loring company, entitled "The Hermit" wherein a young married couple have a serious quarrel enroute on their honeymoon and unload from the bridal train in the heart of the Rockies where they meet the Hermit. The ensuing events are startling not to say surprising.

It takes the colored boys to put over a dance act and the Charles Hightower Trio feature one half dozen of the best educated and number one feet there are stepping today in vaudeville.

The Three Olympians, men of unusually powerful and perfect physical perfection offer feats of strength and daring that are astounding.

Frank Work and Estelle offer a combination of songs, dances and snappy comedy that is light and pleasing amusement.

From twenty to eighty years are the ages the principals in the Universal production of "My Old Dutch," now playing at the Elsinore theater, had to emulate for the screen. It was done in five of the most remarkable pieces of makeup in screen history. May McAvoy, Pat O'Malley, Jean Hersholt and Edgar Kennedy made up for five different ages during the course of the story, which is the tale of a lifetime of two lovers. Cullen Landis plays their son. Several hundred people take part in big spectacles that embellish the romance.

Capitol Theater
Harry Carey has discarded his horse for a railroad train!

Harry Carey, the well-known Western star, who is always seen on the screen in chaps and a two-gallon hat riding a fully equipped pony, has left these trade marks behind him and is playing a "dressed up" role in the Robert Z. Leonard production, "A Little Journey," the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture showing at the Capitol theater today.

Almost the entire action of this production takes place on a fast-moving passenger train, which covers the miles to much better advantage than a Western pony.

In speaking of his departure from Westerns, Carey says, "We used to have a motto when we were making Westerns which said, 'When in doubt, draw your gun!' I find myself reaching for the hip pocket in every tense moment. All I find there is my handkerchief."

Carey plays the role of a San Francisco man of culture in this production, Claire Windsor and William Haines have the leading roles, and Claire McDowell is also in the cast.

An added feature at the Capitol today will be Earl F. Hammond with his dog team and many interesting souvenirs from Alaska.

HEAD OF ENGLISH DEPARTMENT HOME

OREGON NORMAL SCHOOL, Monmouth, March 31.—(Special.)—Edna Mingus, head of the English department of the Monmouth normal school, and who has recently returned from a three months' leave of absence, has again taken up her work in English for the spring term.

Miss Mingus availed herself of the opportunity and enrolled for two post graduate courses in English at the University of Chicago, from which institution she received her masters degree. Before returning to Oregon she visited numerous school systems throughout the middle west, but none of them impressed her quite so much as the Winnetka system of Illinois. She spent several days visiting different departments of the Winnetka schools, especially the English departments, and is highly enthusiastic over the work being accomplished by Dr. Carlton Washburn and his corps of teachers. According to her observations the children in the Winnetka schools are receiving a most desirable type of instruction and she visited no other systems comparable to it.

Among other celebrated institutions, Miss Mingus visited the Chicago Teachers College, State Teachers College at Cedar Falls, Iowa; the Iowa City Pre-Primary School; the New Trier High School System; the Evanston schools and the Gary, Indiana system.

Motion Picture Depicting Scenes From Four Major Battles to Be Shown

Actual motion pictures filmed by the U. S. army in France during the war will be shown at the Capitol theater next Tuesday and Wednesday, under the auspices of the Marion post. Veterans of Foreign Wars.

These remarkable motion pictures are not the wild imagination of a movie director, but a true and authentic record of the doughboys in France. It is the first time the happenings of a real war have been recorded by the camera and it is said that they register more thrills and action than the films manufactured for commercial purposes. The four major battles that are participated in are vividly portrayed.
