LITTLE TOWN PROVIDES REST FOR AIR HEROES

Only a few gallons of fuel sloshed in the great tanks. There was no chance for them to set a course and keep it, nor opportunity in the circumstances to know where they were. A disorienting rain beat down upon them, and they could see no land, no lights—nothing but a sky of inky black.

A correspondent for the Associated Press who flew here from Paris as soon as news of the landing became known, asked Commander Byrd whether he was satisfied from his experience that commercial trans-Atlantic aviation was feasible.

"It is possible," the commander replied. "It will surely come, but it will come slowly, for it is all a matter of evolution."

"I haven't any doubt that we would have reached Paris had it not been for the behavior of the compass, due to some local attraction, perhaps it was something in the plane with magnetic qualities that threw the needle off."

The north pole hero was dead-fired from his three sleepless nights. He accepted in modest fashion the congratulations showered on him, and seemed to feel keen disappointment at not having achieved his goal. But he tried his best to hold his head high, smile and accept what had happened at its proper value—in that it was merely a technical accident.

When he first was congratulated by the correspondent, he said: "You congratulate me, but I feel that maybe I need kicking more than congratulations."

In their wanderings over France Commander Byrd and his companions think they may have been near Paris, but are not sure. The faulty compass wobbled so badly that it kept them flying in circles. Several hours later, when they expected to be over Paris, they found themselves above an amusement park near the sea, just where they do not know. Again they set a course hoping to reach Le Bourget, and kept going until their gasoline was startlingly low. But with the bad compass, and the frightful weather, there was no way of keeping on the course or of knowing their whereabouts.

Then he mentioned the wandering over France with the disabled compass, and no means of ascertaining their position, and in conclusion, said:

"I want to speak especially of the men with me—of their courage and calmness under those extremely hazardous conditions. The conditions could not have been much worse than they were. We found ourselves flying around with no landing place."

Shortly after they awoke this afternoon the fliers were given a formal reception by the village, with music and speech making. It was a brave show, in spite of the rain, which continued to fall. Speaking to the newspaper men who had flown from Paris, Commander Byrd estimated that he had covered 4200 miles in the 42 hours of flying. He declared the passage over the Atlantic in the impetuous fog as a "terrifying experience."
