SIDE LIGHTS OF THE STAGE AND SCREEN

Elsinore Theater

Any woman, fighting with her natural weapons of brain and beauty, can win any point she wishes to accomplish against the dullards who consider themselves dominant males.

A slight pout and flashing eyes are the profanity skinkish; if these fail to start the masculine retreat a few tears can easily be called into play. Then there is the tried and true fact to bring up added reinforcements. More is seldom needed.

A variation of the faint is used by Florence Vidor, epitome of brunette loveliness, in her newest starring picture for Paramount "The World at Her Feet," which shows at the Elsinore today.

Miss Vidor simulates blindness and through this adoption of a pathetic affliction manages to arouse the jealousy of her discontented husband.

She pretends to go blind while entertaining a handsome gentleman who doesn't happen to be her husband. Thus arises a situation that's as old as man but in this instance the denouement comes in a novel way, thanks to Luther Reed's clever direction.

Reed, New York newspaperman and screen writer before becoming a motion picture director, brings a touch of freshness and originality to the handling of every situation. He refuses to follow rote; seeking always to make his characters do the unexpected. This plan has been followed in "The World at Her Feet" with the result that critics everywhere have acclaimed it as "the farce that's different."

When Margaret Anglin was making arrangements for her recent production of Sophocles "Electra" at the Metropolitan Opera house, New York (May 3 and 4) under the sponsorship of the National Community Foundation, she wired Moroni Olsen and Janet Young of the Moroni Olsen Players to obtain their services for important roles. They were then touring through Montana in "Outward Bound," so were unable to accept.

Miss Anglin, who lately received a gold medal for having "kept her work characteristically pure and noble in nature," realized the importance of such capable artists as Moroni Olsen and Janet Young. They were both associated with her last summer in the huge open air production of this play in Berkeley. Janet Young, they played the part of Chrysothemis, the part now being played in New York by Michael Strange (Mrs. John Barrymore).

Mr. Olsen and Miss Young will appear in "The World at Her Feet" at the Elsinore Theater.
