from the penitentiary, will be similarly probed.
Some time ago the girl in today's crime inserted an advertisement in a local paper asking for work. A man called her by telephone. He offered her work and asked her to meet him in an out of the way suburb. Accompanied by her mother, the girl kept the appointment. The man failed to appear.

Again she published another appeal for work. Again the same man answered, and again she asked her to meet him in a desolate district. The girl, this time accompanied by her father, went to meet the man. As in the first instance, he did not appear.

Third Time Success
The third time the advertisement was inserted, and a third time the same man answered by telephone, giving as in the other instances, the name of Warner, and asking the girl to meet him in the same place.

Police were notified. The girl set out to keep the appointment—but a short distance behind her in an automobile, was her mother, two matrons of the police department and two plain clothesmen.
Had the arrival of the automobile been one moment delayed—but it was not—and the girl lives.

Gives Fake Name
Frank C. Miller was the name the gaunt, shifty-eyed man gave when he was brought to central station.

Chief of Police Jenkins rushed to interview him.
"What did you do this for?" he demanded.

"I don't know. I just can't help it. The minute I put my hands on her I knew I had made a mistake and could not control myself."

"What is your true name?" this came sharply.
"Don't you recognize me?" Pender asked after a moment of hesitation.

"I think I know you but I do not place the name right now. Just wait a minute."
"My name is Pender."

Girl Hysterical
The girl, still bearing the red marks of fingers pressed against her throat, wept half-hysterically. Her mother comforted her as the child told of the man's futile attempt to kill her, preceded by an attack in which she was stricken down screaming, and of Pender hissing: "If you scream again I'll kill you."
She did scream again, and again, and Patrolman Fourler, a hundred feet behind, came running and seized the assailant. Save for bruises on her neck, the girl was unharmed.

Pender was pardoned unconditionally by Governor Olcott in 1920, in what was described at that time as a touching scene, during which Pender wept and said to the governor: "I want to say you will never regret your action."
He had been serving a life sentence following his conviction on the Wehrman murders.

leave Mrs. Priest to Werline for the sum of $5,000. He had before accused Werline of alleged intimacies with Mrs. Priest.

As a rider to the offer, Priest said, he demanded that Werline give him the $5,000 in immediate check or in cash, or he would bring action against him for $20,000 damages for alienation of his wife's affections.

Werline laughed at Priest's offer, turned to leave him and Priest shot. The rancher died within the hour.

Defense counsel contended Werline, in turning to leave Priest at the end of their discussion, made a sharp movement of his hand toward his pocket, and that Priest, believing the rancher intended to shoot him, fired to save his own life.

The prosecution denied this contention, proving that Werline was unarmed and that he was shot down in cold blood.

PARIS TURNS OUT FOR YANKEE FLYING GIRL

London-Paris express liners. Haideman crawled out and then a shock of medium bobbed hair above a bright red sweater appeared over the side of the plane.
"There she is; that's Ruth," the spectators shouted.
Ruth Shows Surprise
A look of dismay appeared on the face of the pioneer American woman trans-Atlantic flier as she saw the crowd rushing forward, but smiling she cried, "Good, good," and immediately repeating "bon, tres bon." This was evidently all the French she had for she was almost buried under kisses of the demonstrative French women, she had not another word to say.

Top hatted officials, airmen in glittering uniforms with many bright ribbons adorning their breasts fought to grasp her hand and in the hull of cheering a feminine American voice piped up, "Let me kiss George, that's all."
Miss Elder laughed outright but Captain Haideman, grimy with oil, tinkered with the motor of the plane and said "I'm just the mechanic."

Ruth appeared to be trying under the barrage of flashlight pictures and asked to be allowed to replenish her strength.
"I am getting hungry," she said
