November 26, 1927 But when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful: for he had great possessions. Then said Jesus unto His disciples, Verily I say unto you, that a rich man can hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven.

HAS RIGHT TO GROW

By every standard, building activity, increase of telephones, growth in number of water users, and all the other proofs of expansion, Salem is growing faster than other cities of her class in the five states of this section of the country.

And this is chiefly because of the growth of the industries on the land in Salem's patronizing territories, and of the industries in Salem and her neighboring cities and towns.

If this growth shall continue, Salem will go on growing and prospering accordingly. If it lags, Salem will lag in growth and the well being that goes with expansion.

All the major industries on the land here are expanding. The strawberry industry grew this year to three times its size last year, and qualified judges said, when this announcement was made in the annual Slogan number of The Statesman on the 19th, that there will be no over production next year, and larger acreage will be required in 1928.

There is to be a 50 per cent increase next year in our flax acreage, and perhaps more than a 50 per cent increase in tonnage; especially of the highest priced product.

We are all set for continued and solid growth— But there is one prerequisite; one condition precedent— And that is the necessity of putting our linen industry on its feet; thoroughly; completely; beyond peradventure.

We must do this. It is up to us. We cannot avoid the issue and expect continued symmetrical growth.

So the thing must be done, and forthwith. Every one who can must help—and nearly every one can help more or less. Salem has a right to grow—

But this contemplates that her people take stock and see to it that no cause for impeding the wheels of progress shall be allowed to come, or even seriously threaten.

COST OF SUBSTITUTION

John Todd Somerset, writing in the current number of Drug Topics reveals—for the first time in print, he says—a startling incident in the connection with the death of President McKinley, who was shot by an assassin at a public reception in the city of Buffalo on September 6, 1901.

As the president fell to the ground under the shock of the assassin's bullet, Mr. Somerset says, a number of leading physicians of Buffalo rushed to his assistance. It was not known at the moment whether the missile had reached a vital organ; hence prevention of infection was the immediate task of the moment. A prescription for a standard disinfectant was written and dispatched to a drug store and as soon as the article prescribed was received it was applied to the wound.

The stricken president lingered for eight days and then died. After his death, according to Mr. Somerset, the attending physicians, curious as to the failure of the first aid treatment, had the product which has been sent in response to their prescription analyzed and found to their astonishment that it was not the standard product which they had prescribed, but a base imitation. Instead of containing iodine, as did the standard product, the imitation contained oxide of iron, useless as a prophylactic agent.

From this incident, for which he vouches, Mr. Somerset draws the moral that substitution, at least in the case of standard medicinal preparations, is a crime of the first order. In this particular case, he says, but for the substitution that had been practiced, the life of President McKinley might have been saved. He adds: "The man who perpetrated this deceit ought to have been taken up to some mountain crag where the vultures nest and fed to the carrion."

It will be conceded generally that in the case of medicinal preparations substitution is a peculiarly aggravated crime, because the substituted article, being cheap and valueless, may result in the loss of human lives which might otherwise have been saved. But it must also be conceded that it is always a mean and contemptible practice. It is trading unfairly upon the honesty and the success of others, for in the very nature of things the substituted article is apt to be inferior, because by cutting quality an additional profit can be realized.

The volume of American business has been enormously increased in recent years by standardization of quality and by advertising. By these devices, the ages-old suspicion of the buyer has been lulled and he has been induced to purchase freely, confident because of the advertised trademark of the quality of what he is purchasing. The success of these honorable and praiseworthy methods has naturally led unscrupulous persons to substitute inferior articles on the plea that they are "just as good."

The buying public should be suspicious of this plea. Trade-marked standardization of quality, backed by heavy and continuous expenditures for advertising, is the best possible assurance of a satisfactory product, because the maker of such a product can not afford to risk his reputation by putting out an inferior article.

A CITY APPLE TREE

From the Eugene Register "We've spent this morning picking apples," said one woman to a neighbor. "We picked six or seven bushels of the finest apples you ever saw, and we've given away a lot before today."

"Apples! From a tree on your lot here in the city?" exclaimed the neighbor.

"Yes. And the funny thing about it is that we set out that tree as a shade tree, just because we happen to like apple trees. Some disease threatened it and so we had it carefully sprayed and pruned, just to protect it as a shade tree, and now it has rewarded us with these quantities of fine apples. I wonder why people don't use apple trees more for ornament and shade. They are lovely trees."

Somebody else asks why people in the country don't plant more quick-growing nut trees in old wood lots, decadent orchards or abandoned pastures.

Perhaps it is just lack of imagination. People forget about the charm and profit to be derived from a few fruit or nut trees when they are beautifying their yards. They imagine there's no use planting one such tree on a small lot because they think of it only in terms of edible crops and fail to realize how much pleasure and beauty it will yield.

The above suggestions from the Eugene Register are good ones—

Provided always that the random apple and nut trees be given proper attention, after the manner of the prescribed rules that must be followed to keep them free from disease—

Otherwise they will be sure to become pest carriers and a menace to the men who are building up the commercial orchards that are bringing large profit and enduring fame and are to bring larger profit and more enduring fame to our valley.

I SHALL PICK MY APPLES NOW

By George Law Curry, in the Portland Journal The author of these verses is a resident of Linn county. His home is at Mist Hills farm, in the Santiam mountains, near Scio. He is a son of George Law Curry, who in the '50s was territorial governor of Oregon, the last of the territorial line.

I shall go out and pick my apples now— Deep reddening on the bended bough. The autumn dews have kissed them, every one, And mild October's glorious sun Hath graced them all with such a fume The fruit's more scented than was the bloom.

But comes the red-winged flicker from the skies, He, thief, who walks in jumps whene'er he flies, A flick of red-and-white, a blazoned shield— He will share with me my orchard's gorgeous yield, And soon about the house will carve a door, Then ruin the choicest apple to pluck a worthless core.

They say no fruit's so rare as that which fell And lost itself beneath the ferny turf a spell. Its aromatic fragrance extols the hidden wine That, cup for cup, excels the vineyard's vine, And toasted, sputtering on the fireplace hearth, Restores once more lost childhood's heaven to earth. Santiam Hills, October, 1927

A BABY APPLE TREE

A little apple tree at my window grows; From where it came no one knows. It started from a tiny sprig, Now it is beginning to get big.

When it peeped brightly out of the ground, I thought it a weed and nearly cut it down; But something seemed to stop my hoe, And what it was I did not know.

All summer I kept it from destruction Till it grew into a most healthy condition, And the tiny green waxen leaves Wave and flutter in the breeze.

It has now grown to the top of my window, And rocks to and fro as the wind does blow, No longer is the baby trunk green, For turning into brown it may be seen.

The sweet peas entwined all around it Are dying from the place they found it; It is now gazing at the skies, Hoping to reach it before it dies.

It is as straight as the radio pole, And rocks excitedly from the knoll. The tree appears as if to speak A message from every tiny leaf.

Can you guess what the message is? To know is a most wonderful bliss; In just one word I'll tell you aloud— It is the Maker, which is—God.

At the Salem Rotary club yesterday, the governor, the state treasurer, members of the supreme court, other officials and business men of Salem enjoyed a pre-Thanksgiving dinner of turkey and all that goes with it. Rotary's motto is that he profits most who serves best. No service is more beautifully given than that which brings together in fellowship the men who carry the heavy official responsibilities of state.—Portland Journal.

There must have been a lack of discipline at Folsom penitentiary, to invite the recent riot. And idleness. There has been idleness there, excepting for work in some road camps. Idleness is not good for prison discipline. And discipline in a prison is the paramount thing needed. There is no cruelty in strict discipline. Cruelty always results from the want of it.

U. S. OBSERVES THANKSGIVING

ENTIRE NATION ATTENDS RELIGIOUS SERVICES People Gather at Churches in Washington and Other Cities of Country

WASHINGTON, Nov. 25.—(AP)—In keeping with the call of President Coolidge the nation gave thanks again Thursday for other year of divine favor.

In Washington, as elsewhere, the people assembled in their churches for appropriate Thanksgiving Day religious services. The president and Mrs. Coolidge participated in those of the First Congregational church, held before noon in Keith theater, the congregation being required to use other buildings while its own is undergoing repairs.

Other government officials and members of the diplomatic corps went to the churches of their faith and a large number of the Latin and South American diplomats attended the Pan-American mass in St. Patrick's Catholic church. Returning from the Thanksgiving Day services, Mr. Coolidge was serenaded by the army band on the front lawn of the White House, several thousands having gathered there for the program. The president, with Mrs. Coolidge, listened to the music from the foyer of the executive mansion and went out under the portico when the band concluded its selections with the "Star Spangled Banner." Later they posed with the band for pictures.

Services at Keith theater likewise were attended by a capacity crowd. The president and Mrs. Coolidge were accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Stearns, of Boston, who later were the only White House guests at the turkey dinner. Responding to balmy autumn weather, Mrs. Coolidge wore a gown of green velvet with out a coat, and a small pile of mink at her throat. Her hat also was of green velvet and her shoes and stockings were russet.

Although the day was spent quietly at the White House, Mr. Coolidge rose early today to work for several hours on his message to congress. After a short walk, he joined Mrs. Coolidge for the two block drive to church services. The Rev. Jason Noble Pierce, pastor of the president's church, delivered a sermon on the meaning of "real thanksgiving," choosing as his text the tenth and eleventh verses of his ninth chapter of second Corinthians.

Before beginning his sermon he read from Mr. Coolidge's Thanksgiving Day proclamation. As at the executive offices, other government departments gave themselves over to the holiday. Many Washingtonians spent the afternoon at the George Washington-Catholic university football game which has come to be considered an integral part of the day's festivities here. Tomorrow the annual trek of government officials and army and navy officers to the army-navy football game in New York Saturday will begin.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS AGO

From columns of the Statesman, November 27, 1902.)

The wheat market is still strong with an upward tendency, in fact, it is daily growing stronger, and from present indications 70 cents will be paid in less than 30 days.

The following ticket was placed in the field by the republicans in city convention assembled: Mayor, J. A. Baker; Recorder, S. A. McFadden; Marshal, Albert Disque; Treasurer, W. T. Rigdon.

Is cartoon art indigenous to Marion county soil? Many newspaper artists have come from the neck of the woods. Some of them are Homer Davenport, and Frank Bowers, Indianapolis News; Warren Gilbert, Denver Post; Clyde L. Keller, of San Francisco; Ed. S. Bits For Breakfast

Salem has right to grow— And is due for steady and permanent growth—

If her people will do their part; and the thing they must do right now is to make the linen industry a going business.

In this way is safety and progress, and symmetrical advancement.

Salem gets a good quota of conventions next year. We should be better prepared for big gatherings. We must have an auditorium. And a stadium. The other needed things will follow. There are already many essentials of a good convention city here.

Our pure bred livestock breeders are doing a great deal to spread the good name and fame of Salem and the Willamette valley. They deserve much of our people.

There are a lot of opportunities to get more industrial payrolls in Salem. But, first and foremost, we must take care of the linen mill situation. Nothing must get in the way of that.

The Salem chamber of commerce, after getting behind and helping to put over the linen mill proposition, ought to take up, for a major effort, the securing of irrigation on a large scale. It is in the cards.
