HERBERT HOOVER'S SEVEN U. S. BUSINESS PILGRIMAGES

(This is the second installment of an article which will appear in the April Magazine of Business, in which Robert R. Updegraff tells of the "middle" 15 years of Herbert Hoover's life.)

Seven times has Hoover journeyed around the world on mining missions that were in effect American business pilgrimages. For each time he traveled, from wherever he went—Australia, India, China, Russia, South Africa—there came back a stream of orders for American mining machinery and equipment, a constant call for American mining engineers to come out and take important posts and install American methods and set up American standards.

Lead seems to be known of this middle period of his early Hoover's career than of his later service in Belgium and his subsequent work in Washington as Food Administrator. And yet the years between 1898 and 1914, when (for several of these years in partnership with his brother) he operated a general mining engineering business, form one of the most interesting periods of his life to date.

The story of that period of approximately 15 years should hold great interest for the business man, for some of the policies Hoover developed during those years, when he operated from San Francisco a business with branch offices (at various periods) in London, Paris, Petrograd, Melbourne, and Shanghai, set a standard for American trade relations that may very profitably be followed today, not only in mining but in all kinds of commercial contacts.

TOO MANY CHANGES SUPREME COURT OPPOSES USELESS ASSIGNMENTS

Chief Justice Brandeis warned against applications for assignment of judges to various judicial districts unless there is actual disqualification of the local judge within the meaning of the statutes or the congestion of court business demands such relief. The warning was based on a report of the secretary of state showing that funds to cover the expenses of the judges assigned was running low, and that a deficit probably would be created before the expiration of the current biennium.

and productive capacity for the benefit of the countries in which they operated, and of American business as well. It would be hard to estimate the value of this world gridle of American engineers and American machinery and methods and ideas, nor is that the primary purpose of the present article. A business audience is interested in the What and the How of things. What did Hoover do, to earn an international reputation in a field as difficult as is mining, and how did he do it? The study of some of these undertakings will serve to bring out the important place of the American engineer in our foreign trade. His first journey from home was to Australia. A youth of 23, fresh from college and a strenuous engineering apprenticeship, he was sent into the newly discovered gold fields of West Australia as a member of the engineering staff of a group of 15 partially developed mines.
