TRAVEL NOTES: TO MAKE EMPIRE GREAT

Louis Simpson, Dream City Builder of Coos, Creates New Industry

The lumber king of Coos bay country, Louis J. Simpson of North Bend, and owner of Shore Acres, is recalling into life and existence what was once Empire, Oregon, a great harbor with a great hotel and a great sawmill. In the language of Joseph Jefferson's Rip Van Winkle, "How soon we are gone and forgotten." That shall not be, says that prince of Romanists, the Honorable Louis J. The magic of millions is being brought to bear, erecting a sawmill that will stand among the big sawlog devouring mammoths of the Pacific coast. About $4,000,000 is said to have been snatched from the strongholds of finance to rebuild dear old neglected and abandoned Empire, of the Coos bay country, which the scion of the Simpson family loves like the apple of his eye. Chips are flying, saws are humming, cutting building material, and the chorus of the hammer brigade is heard on the hillsides. Empire is probably the richest spot in the world, where the mud flats produce shellfish and bivalves famous for their melting tenderness. A man whose soul spells enterprise and his heart throbs with joyous undertakings is waving his magic wand over the dream city as westward empire dreams its way, where there shall be hundreds of new homes and generations of bounding, leaping prosperity. Keep your eye on Empire. You do not have to watch what Louis Simpson will do to that abandoned municipal morgue, that is being brought back from its dead and departed glory and made over as completely into a new city, like Solomon's Jerusalem paved with golden streets of modern electric enterprise.

deared in The Lariat, Salem, Oregon, August, 1927:)

Shifting Sand There was a town here where silence reigns. And where shifting sand is all that remains. And empty houses on either hand Poked their rooftops through the sand— Since the storm come covering over. The grain fields and fields of clover— Where mountain waters were piped down From the far hills to the town— And the ranches all around it. Were nothing but sand when we found it.

Like fire slowly profaning the gloom, Sand moved onward to the doom Of the hardy farmer whose ranch house stood At the dunes' edge far from the wood. Cattle contentedly browsing the field. Almost rained past another yield Of food for them while the farmer cursed. Encroaching sand and impending thirst. — COL. E. HOFER, Editor The Manufacturer, Salem, Or., Apr. 2, 1928.

MAKING CELLOPHANE WESTERN PAPER CONVERTING COMPANY SUCCESSFUL

Something very similar to the rayon industry which Professor Florian Von Eschen of Willamette university urged recently at a chamber of commerce luncheon as one which could be introduced here with profit, is being carried on at the Western Paper Converting company plant in Salem. It was mentioned at Monday's luncheon by C. E. Beyerl, manager of the company, who was the industrial speaker of the day.

This is cellophane, which involves the same process as rayon but is made into sheets for various uses instead of into cloth. It is a wood fiber product. The Willamette valley is the poorest customer this company has, said Mr. Beyerl, as relatively poor grades of wrapping paper are used here. Moreover, Oregon is not patronizing the loose writing paper for school use which is being made there in quantities for other states, but is continuing to use the out-of-date tablet.

The Western Paper Converting company was organized so as to utilize the paper made at the local paper mill, and is having marked success, says Mr. Beyerl. Some of the products are aluminum foil wrappers, liners, glassine, glassine fancy bags and wrappers, waxed paper for baking cups, finger bowls, etc., greaseproof wrappers, street car transfers, embossed paper, adding machine, cash register, and desk roll paper, and many others. These products are being shipped to all parts of the United States and many foreign countries.

HERBERT HOOVER'S SEVEN U. S. BUSINESS PILGRIMAGES

(This is the sixth installment of an article appearing in the April Magazine of Business, in which Robert R. Updegraff tells of the little known "middle 15 years" of Herbert Hoover's life.) As Will Irwin says in his forthcoming biography of Hoover (The Century Company). "In all that period of far-flung activities, Hoover boarded an ocean liner as casually as you or I take a trolley-car." He would show up in his office in San Francisco, get in touch with new American developments in mining and metallurgy, contact with the new crop of American mining engineers; per-haps order American equipment for a big foreign smelting plant, and presently sail away again to oversee another big job in some different quarter of the globe.

It was thus that he sailed one day for Russia to tackle the Kyshtim mine in the Ural mountains. This was a great estate comprising iron and copper mines, smelters for copper and iron, turning out that fine form of Russian steel which is known all over the world as "Russian sheet." As an industrial venture, Kyshtim had everything against it. It had a record for stock manipulation in London although it was largely owned by Russians. The underground methods in the mine had been a failure. It had an expensive and useless metallurgical plant. It was on the point of receivership when Hoover and a small group of American engineers, with a large stock of American ideas and a library of American catalogs, arrived on the ground.

They concluded that copper ores, while unprofitable in the existing small blast-furnace treatment, would be very highly profitable if the unique process of pyritic smelting which had been developed at Butte, Montana, should be applied. It required large-scale application, for the grade of ores was very low in copper. It meant the building of furnaces which would treat thousands of tons a day, instead of furnaces which would treat hundreds of tons.

In due time, with the provision of the necessary capital, these enormous furnaces were built and from the day that fires were lighted in them the company began to earn profits. But to get all from the estate, that was possible, by-products of acids were made from the sulphur gases; wood-distillation was inaugurated on modern lines to furnish charcoal to the iron-ore furnaces; and from the wood by-products with the acid, a line of commercial products was built up. It all embraced a tangled yet complete metallurgical cycle requiring highest engineering skill. Also, it took surpassing management—management with sufficient acumen to realize that while the owners of Kyshtim, like the Australians and the Chinese, the South Africans and the New Zealanders, wanted American methods of mining and American results, they wanted also to develop a Russian mining industry. Staffs of Russian engineers were brought and trained by American engineers and developed in American methods, in American machinery, to go out into other parts of Russia where they served virtually as trade agents for American industry in the various plants and industries in which they became associated.

There were many problems to deal with besides technical questions and the management of such industrial companies. Problems of labor, problems of housing, problems of education, great hordes of 5,000 to 10,000 men. The American dislikes to see the low standard of living amongst the folk in the backward civilizations. No American can live in these countries without doing his little to advance the fundamental progress of those people. So it came about that Kyshtim is one of the few model towns of Russia.

And thus it came to pass that Hoover and his engineer associates, men of the caliber of Gilman Brown, W. F. Keen, James Woodruff, Charles Jones, and many others, left a fine appreciation of American men as men in the community where they lived and did their work.

Hoover resigned his professional association with this enterprise as well as all others to assume the burdens of the Belgian relief in 1914, and in 1917 the Bolsheviks seized this property, exported the Americans, jailed the Russian engineers, and the property closed down for lack of brains to run it. When the great Russian famine came in 1922, the people were starving in hundreds. At this time one of Hoover's men went up to take charge of the relief, and the relief archives contain a petition that Mr. Hoover and his men should come back; that if it works could be started again, that would restore the golden age.
