There has been a great deal said about landing fields, some of it is true and some of it is not true. Some people have the mistaken idea that most any field is not so true. Some people have the mistaken idea that most any field is good enough for an airplane to land on.

managed to show somehow that the government owed them money. So all these signs of the season assure me that spring may yet come again, with its balmy breezes and balmy flowers and balmy spring poets, and planes and pilots ailing the 1928 crop of cash customers.

There is no better argument for air travel than the experience of visiting an airport, preferably a municipal airport, in the winter. A municipal airport is a forlorn hope in real estate, selected by a committee of politicians and realtors and dedicated and consecrated by His Honor the Mayor.

There are two ways of looking at a municipal airport. One way is to walk out on it, being careful not to lose your rubbers, and just look at it. The other is to enter the office and study the drawing hung on the wall, which represents the airport as it will be when the city council remembers it long enough to spend some money on it.

The absurdity of hiding airports in the back yards of our cities is obvious. Some day, of course, there will be a lot of expensive repentance over it. Since it will be difficult to move the city out to the airports it will be necessary to cut a hole in the city by wiping out whole blocks of building and loan mortgages to let in the air.

the airlines. Such airlines will go wherever they will and can, and the new map will look much less like a nervous system of trunk and branch lines fading away into nothing and more like a telephone exchange in which every substitution is the center of its own universe.

A little weather, more or less, won't stop this new geography. Nor shall we stop the weather, though it might be an excellent idea and one to engage the attention of a dozen congressional committees and keep them out of worse mischief. All we can do is to play with it, which is another name for meteorology, the favorite indoor sport of flying fields in bad weather. Meteorology, between you and me, is also one of the side-shows tacked on to the flying school to make it appear to be worth the money, and after the student is all through with it he will know how to go to the hangar door and sniff at the climate and make a good guess, just like a real hard-balled pilot.

If a student wants to get a head start on flying school he can start right away with a little weather forecasting on his own account. For this he will need a reliable set of corns, sensitive and responsive to wet weather, or else a thermometer, barometer and hygrometer. A thermometer is an instrument devised principally as a basis of suburban arguments, since two front-porch thermometers rarely agree on anything except that they never say such weather. A barometer hangs on the wall and is tapped thoughtfully until it goes up or down or merely wiggles, from which one may draw what conclusions seems advisable. A hygrometer is an instrument for measuring the humidity, and is usually constructed from a strand of human hair. When the air is dry the hair shortens; when it becomes damp the hair lengthens. When the humidity is very bad indeed, the logical thing to do, of course, is to give the hygrometer a haircut.
