of six national A. A. U. championship marks in the running events at metric distances, meet records were shattered by Hamm in the broad jump, by Herman Brix, University of Washington giant, in the shot put, by Creth Hines in the javelin and by five competitors in the pole vault, won by the Olympic champion, Lee Barnes, in a jump off of a triple tie with Sabin Carr of Yale and William Droegemeier of Northwestern, at 13 feet 9 inches.

Brix came within a quarter of an inch of equalling the world's record in the shot put, improving on his qualifying performance of the day before and leading three Pacific coast rivals, Rothert, Knick and Krenz, by tossing the 16 pound ball a distance of 50 feet 11 1/4 inches.

EXPERT CHEMISTS WORK ON CANNING PROBLEMS

that is another story. Mr. Richardson is modest and secretive.

His job now is with the Salem cannery of the Oregon Packing company, one of the units of the far-flung organization of the Del Monte canneries and packing houses, the operation of which extend around the whole earth.

Mr. Richardson is not merely at this time experimenting with one problem, like that with which the Black Republican cherries are concerned. He is experimenting with thousands of problems. The Black Republican cherries come into the picture merely because they happen to be the most difficult variety of all the cherries to can successfully.

By the way, there are more problems in the successful canning of the fruits of the Salem district than in the packing of the fruits of any other section of the entire world. First, we have a great variety here. This is the land of diversity. Secondly, our fruits are nearly all red, and the red fruits present the most difficult canning problems. Mr. Richardson could explain. But that would be another story, too.

The Many Experiments—Mr. Richardson has a laboratory at the back end of the Twelfth street cannery. He has charge of another room where samples of all the fruits being canned daily are examined and sampled and tested. He has another series of rooms, on one of the upper floors, where there are 10,000 to 15,000 cans of fruits and vegetables under observation. Some of these cans of fruits and vegetables have been under observation for 14 years. They are kept under lock and key. The temperature is maintained evenly the year through. Even the turning on of an electric light, if left on too long, would change the temperature, so this is avoided.

Every can is numbered and charted. Every examination is noted on the chart. The whole thing is like an intricate set of book-keeping books. Every item is important in each experiment being carried on.

The reader is, by this time, aware of the fact that Mr. Richardson is necessarily a busy man. No wonder he works both days and nights.

makes up a huge total annually. The whole sum already expended for this purpose, since the association was organized, and up to the time of a recent report, was $15,000,000. Some of the world's greatest chemists have been, and are now, in the service of this association. Men like Mr. Coman, the highest authority in the world on vitamins as related to canning.

Still More Experimenting

Then there is still more experimenting. The American Can company has a large force of experts always at work. One of them has been at work in Salem constantly. But that is still another story. The American Can company must be a jump ahead of the other forces in the canning industry. They must provide the right kind of cans that are needed in the way of preserving and marketing the foodstuffs of the country: fruits and vegetables and fish and meats.

They Do Many Things

Such chemists as Mr. Richardson, working here in Salem, have many problems. Here is an illustration: The chemists with like duties working for the Del Monte canning plants in Hawaii that pack pineapples, have worked out the problems of eliminating waste and of conservation. The edible part of the pineapple is cut into a cylindrical shaped piece, which is in turn cut into slices just fitting the can. Every housewife knows how this is. Naturally there is a lot of the meaty part of the fruit left. Part of this is shredded and canned. Every housewife knows also about shredded pineapple. But there is still left some of the fruit of the pineapple that contains the most sugar. This is pressed and the juice is used in making a very fine vinegar. Some of it is also used in making alcohol. This alcohol is employed in running the motor cars around the packing houses; a substitute for gasoline. And the pulp is dried. The dried pulp is burned under the stationary boilers, making power for the engines. And the ash residue, taken from under the boilers, makes an excellent fertilizer. It is used for that purpose, in order to grow more and better pineapples. A perfect circle. No waste. It is 100 per cent conservation.

Secrets and No Secrets

The facts found by all this experimentation of all these forces become common property for the whole industry, if they relate to problems of health for the consumers of canned food articles. In this field, there are no secrets. The work is for the common good. Their work in relation to such special problems as the growing of the right kind of raw supply for the making of canned material for pumpkin pies, and that of the right kind of handling of the raw stock in the canning plant, such as has been developed by the chemists for the 13th street cannery of the Oregon Packing company in Salem, are trade secrets of their own. Turning out for the general trade canned pumpkin pie is a matter that has assumed many canners. The Salem pumpkin cannery has all this worked down to a fine point. Naturally, the Del Monte people wish to retain the knowledge of the process their experts have worked out, for their special benefit.

It Is Their Due

All the above is written partly because it is interesting information. It makes a good news story. And it is written partly because of the fact that the general public, our farmers and all our other people here, ought to know and to have a high appreciation of what the men in the canning industry are doing for them. They are working for a larger use of our land in producing the raw materials for canning. They are toiling for the good of the working people who need the employment they get from the men on the land and from those connected in many ways with the canning industry in the city. And this takes a wide scope. It includes many lines not directly connected with the canning industry. It includes every one who has any kind of a stake here, in the country or in the city.

B. D. Beede, manager of the Oregon Packing company's plants here in Salem, has been in the cannery industry all his life, almost; ever since he worked as a boy in the canneries of California. He is enthusiastic in cooperating with the researches of such men as Mr. Richardson. The whole organization of the Del Monte chain of operations is on its toes in respect to this kind of work. It is a part of their business. Selfish? Yes. But theirs is a selfishness that benefits the districts where they operate, and that is for the good of the whole consuming public.

Called by Wire

Since the above was written, Mr. Richardson has been called to San Francisco by wire, to sit in on some of the problems being considered by the chemists of the laboratory there. This is an indication of the high regard entertained by these chemists for the ability in his chosen field of Mr. Richardson. It may be added, though the information did not come from Mr. Richardson himself, that he grew up in an atmosphere of chemical science. His father had the chair of chemistry at Stanford university. Herbert Hoover, Republican candidate for president, took his chemistry under the elder Richardson. And A. C. Richardson was a classmate of Hoover.

Mr. Beede hopes Mr. Richardson

may be sent back to Salem, because he is a man of unusual training in his chosen profession of chemist. Mr. Beede was superintendent of the sauer kraut plant of the Del Monte line at Kenton, below Portland. He was assistant manager of the Salem plants for six years, under Edward C. Quinn, deceased, who was long in charge here. He has been manager since the death of Mr. Quinn early last year.

CHARLEY PADDOCK PROTESTS RECEIVED

BOSTON, July 7.—(AP).—

Protest of the eligibility as an amateur of Charley Paddock, veteran California sprinter, by at least one foreign country because of his motion picture activities, is understood to have been received by the American Olympic committee and figured tonight in the debate over the track and field team selections behind closed doors.

No official statement was forthcoming either on the Paddock case or on the final selections, except that the latter would be announced tomorrow in New York by Frederick W. Rubien, secretary of the committee.

It was learned, however, on good authority that the authorities face a perplexing problem in the case of Paddock. Paddock's movie activities have been a subject of concern for some time. The Californian was given a "clean bill
