MINIMUM FIRE LOSS REPORTED ON COAST

Oregon Federal and Private Lands Suffer Slight Damage To Date

PORTLAND, July 21.—"Forest fire losses practically negligible so far this season" is the report made to the Western Forestry and Conservation association simultaneously by practically all private, state and federal forest protective agencies on the Pacific coast from California to Montana.

Almost no merchantable timber destruction is recorded, though there has been some loss of logs and settler's improvements from slashing fires. The greatest damage is where fire has touched open areas so dry that control was not reached until some seedling reforestation was killed. In some regions the excellent situation up to date is ascribed to continued favorable weather, and in others to the preparation work enabled by a wet June for meeting bad conditions now prevailing. Everywhere, however, the fire season seems now definitely on, with every precaution necessary by loggers, settlers and forest visitors.

Washington has had about 300 fires, lightning being the largest single cause, with almost no timber loss but some $20,000 damage to loggers and settlers. Loggers have also had heavy expense for fighting slashing fires in the Gray's Harbor region.

Oregon state and private expenditure has been over $100,000, largely for improving equipment and facilities, but losses have been slight on either private or federal lands. Forest material is becoming dry, however.

Idaho reports a fair number of small fires, with lightning and careless public the chief causes, but damage only about $60,000, mostly logs and poles.

The state forester of Montana reports 27 fires so far, with no damage worth mentioning. Late reports on Montana and Idaho are not in.

Late California state reports are not in but the situation is described by the national forest administration as forest material unusually dry, threatening great difficulty if hot dry weather occurs, but weather favorable so far. The season's fires number 375, burning 23,000 acres of brush and non-commercial woodland, 4000 acres of potential forest land and 2000 acres of timber, but without heavy damage. Forest visitors are not allowed to smoke and must carry ax and shovel.

Summarized, the Pacific coast situation is a minimum-loss season so far, due partly to weather and partly to better production than ever before, but conditions such that very few exceptionally dry days, such as can now be expected, are necessary to make the increasing hazard seriously acute.
