GOOD-BYE TO A SUMMER CABIN

Little House, I think you know
That tomorrow I must go;
Leave you lonely, just the same
As I found you when I came,
Leave you to the squirrel and bat;
Leave your low porch where I sat
To the chipmunk wild and free;
And the lizard from the tree
Near your door will roam the gloom
As before, from room to room.
This last time I sweep your floors,
Close your windows, lock your doors;
Leave you to the sun and rain—
Lonely till I come again.

English Masses Support Anglo-American Amity

LONDON, July 23.—(AP)—The prospect of permanent Anglo-American friendship was shown by recent observations here to rest chiefly on the high regard for American civilization almost universally displayed by England's poor and middle classes.

While the English speaking union and a dozen other organizations continue their steady and useful work of interpreting England to America and America to England, the unemloyed groups in England need little stimulus to unite them in friendship toward the United States.

Whatever criticism one hears of America in England comes usually from the upper classes, even though the same classes initiate the movement for better Anglo-American relations. The sly sneer or quip at the American accent, American tourists, American prosperity and American movies generally comes from the British intelligentsia.

The ordinary people of England, beginning with the cockney and extending to the shopkeeper, are decidedly pro-American. They have heard tales of the democracy of the mine boy and Al Smith the fish-hawker. They are candidates for the presidency. They have heard that the only aristocracy is that of wealth and that such is not the case. British aristocracy is based on birth and titled recognition of exceptional achievement. Money is not so easily made and the office-boy does not so often marry the bank president's daughter.

The cockney is more amenable to American influence exerted through the movie, the phonograph and the jazz song than is the aristocrat, for his diversions are much more confined. He does not see so many plays, does not travel, reads very little. His amusements are American movies and American music, whether phonographic or script, to which he dances.

It is indicative of this influence that so many American slang words are found in the cockney parlors. Guy, bird, flop, skirt, and a host of others have been imported from America via the movie and the phonograph.

the phonograph, for cockney consumption. The cockney leaves off the "g" in "ing" words, overworks "ain't" and smooths over his "it's" into "d's." The aristocrat does none of these things.

It has been the writer's privilege to make a series of talks to clubs and societies of the poorer sections of London. The reception given by the cockney people was uniformly cordial. The talks were all of America, and I was assured that the attendance was larger than usual. Judging from the questions which following these talks, these working-class people are keenly interested in the republic in the west, and their questions evinced a knowledge of America which was sometimes startling.

They were particularly interested in knowing the condition of American workmen of the corresponding grade as themselves. Was it true what they had read that carpenters had their own automobiles, that plasterers made $50 and $55 a week, while they were making only $20 and $25. Was it true that most American workmen had their own homes and little gardens?

Many of them expressed a desire to go to America. They said they had heard that British workmen were well-received on the other side.
