Salem has only achieved a fractional part of its ultimate growth. There are very plain signs indicating this. Not the least convincing is the readiness of out-of-town investors of means to pay good money for Salem real estate at prices that seem inflated to average citizens. It is notorious that native citizens are the last to see that property values in their own cities lag behind comparative values with similar properties in cities of equal size. The Florida boom surprised none as much as the Floridans. Real estate brokers are always saying "See that property? I could have bought it a few years ago for half its present value." And when an investor does pay a good price for property, instead of believing that a man smart enough to have the money might really know what he was about most of us act like the farmer who saw the rhinoceros. We shudder and say, "there ain't no such animal." It is nice for individuals to foresee this growth and profit by it. It is supremely important for the city as a whole that its increase be anticipated by adequate plans.
