LET'S LIVE! MILDRED LAMB

READ THIS FIRST:

Several disturbing elements had already entered the life of Mildred Lamb, who had just married the attractive, irresistible Larry Brown. They were spending the night at the home of a friend, and Mildred was sitting up in bed, waiting for Larry to come to her. When the door opened, she saw a man in a dark suit, who she recognized as a friend of Larry's, standing in the doorway. He was looking at Mildred with a strange expression, and she felt a chill run down her spine. She called out to Larry, but he did not answer. The man stepped forward, and Mildred saw that he was holding a gun. She tried to run, but he caught her, and she felt a sharp pain in her arm. She looked up at him, and he smiled. "Don't worry," he said. "I'm only borrowing your husband for a while. He'll be back soon."

(NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY.)

CHAPTER VIII.

BUT LARRY HADN'T BEEN LEFT BEHIND.

He came in from the coach in the rear, looking a little guilty and Byrd guessed at once that he had been saying good-bye to India where there were no spectators.

"If I'd been the racket," he said lamely, flashing his gay smile at her which he had long ago learned smoothed away all irritation.

"Very often a man is endowed with some feminine charm, like a smile or a soft voice, and disguised as a male trait, it has a double lure. Add Larry knew that she could dissolve any woman with that smile."

"Aren't you getting a little tired of all this rice and white satin and 'just married' business?" Larry asked, moodily.

Byrd checked the question that was on the tip of her tongue. They were just beginning their honeymoon, and she was going to forget every incident associated with those terrible twenty-four hours.

Only one thing bothered her and bothered her terribly. She constantly put the guilty and unworthy thought away from her. But there it stood, a ghostly question mark, in the back of her consciousness.

"Where had Larry spent the previous night? Why did India lie about it? How much did she know about it?"

"Gee, gosh, I'm glad we're through with that bunch," he said as he drew the door of their drawing room shut behind him.

He said it with so much honest emotion that Byrd felt she would rather all he had been to blame for any of the occurrences of the night before. Weddings were important events and had to be duly celebrated even though only one's friends and family got any fun out of them.

"Kiss me, graybird," said Larry, as he drew her gently down on the rug. "I haven't had time yet to realize you belong to me."

"Oh Larry," said Byrd, with the tears very near the surface, "what a relief it'll be just to be alone for a week. It hasn't seemed a bit sacred and beautiful and well, you know, different than if we were just pals on a lark."

Byrd stole a glance at his face, so slim, young and angular, with high cheeks under his dark eyes. Why, in Hollywood, Byrd decided, his strong, tense darkness, relieved only by the white wing of that smile, like lightning across a murky sky, and those dynamic eyes that glinted sparks of fire, would have won him a fortune.

"A tiny, little hurt appeared way down below the deep places of her being. She wished he wasn't quite so handsome! Then she pushed the thought back down again for she was ashamed of her selfishness."

Larry suddenly crushed her against him so tightly that it hurt; yet she had no wish to be released.

"I'm so darned crazy about you that—oh, wait and see if I won't love you to pieces—devour you!" and his eyes looked into hers passionately.

"You'll have to work awfully hard to love me as much as I love you," whispered Byrd. She smiled up at him happily.

"Think so?" he looked at her sharply. Then he grinned. "I never thought I'd get married. I intended to stay gay bachelor all my days. So you know how hard that I'm awfully hard hit to get married at all!"

Byrd's breath quickened and her heart with its violent beating seemed to crowd out all the other organs that belonged in her light young body. Love, romance, marriage, the most wonderful things in the world. She had them all! She knew that no other woman had ever been loved or had ever loved so deeply, so consumingly, so absorbingly!

Love—love—love! Nothing in the whole wide world could ever destroy that divine flame that consumed her. . . . that seemed to merit every barrier between her and the love of Larry. . . . that responded so ardently to that cascade of emotions that Larry was pouring over her.

For Byrd had only lived on the surface, on the outer shell of the great pulsing thing called life. She had looked into a mirror which had given back only her own smiling reflection, nothing deeper or darker clouding her vision than leaves drifting on the sunlit surface of a stream.

Byrd nestled, like a homing pigeon in the strong circle of his arms which held her fast like leather thongs. Larry kissed her white forehead that shaded so marvelously into the shell pink of her satin cheeks. In turn, the blended gradually into a deeper coral until it was lost in the blood red of her lips, twin cherries that seemed to be trembling, waiting to be plucked.

Byrd's eyes closed and she was content to drift out into the sea of oblivion, carried on a quiet current until she was submerged in deep waters and left by the motion of the waves passing over her.

From the funny old-fashioned back, drawn by horses and driven by a little straw-faced man, with "Greenbrier and Cottages," painted on its side, Byrd got her first view of the hotel.

She was dazzled by its magnificence. Crowning a sloping hill, it spread its white Georgian length over acres of green carpet, stretching its great porticoed arms on either side and sending its mighty, fluted columns up into the sky, as any old Greek temple.

Uniformed attendants received them. An air of grandeur hung about the great rooms. The clerks behind the polished counter, in their pinch-back coats and slightly flared trousers, reflected the arrogance of wealth in their smug questioning attitude. But Larry's own assured manner and more arrogant politeness was quite a match for theirs and soon brought servile recognition.

Byrd wished she had told Larry that she would be completely happy in a tiny room up under the eaves.

"Suite A, third floor, sir. Forty dollars, sir," replied the clerk politely.

"Is it simply heavenly, isn't it Larry?" asked Byrd as she inspected the parlor, bedroom and bath. "Just look at the gold cloth on the walls and this darling painted furniture and taffeta hangings!"

"The view of the Blue Ridge mountains from all sides is simply marvelous," said Larry, walking from window to window.

"I think they've given us the royal suite, and only forty dollars. That's actually cheap for a hotel like this, don't you think so?" Byrd was laying out her toilet articles.

She was startled by Larry's bursting into uncontained laughter.

"You're a good egg!" he came over to her and patted her shoulder approvingly. "I know you're trying to be a real sport!" His tone became gentle.

"You know, of course, we're paying forty dollars a day?" Byrd collapsed. At that rate, she sat down quite suddenly and landed in the middle of the floor.

"Why, Larry, why no, it couldn't be possible. . . ." she stammered.

"Yes, Ma'am! My little green apple, not to mention my little green cheese! But who's kicking anyway?" he asked, grinning. "We may be unlucky enough never to have another honeymoon, you know. . . . so we're going to make this one strangle!"

They arranged their clothes in drawers and closets and dressed leisurely.

The great lobby, decked out like a medieval drawing room, with davenport, great couches and enormous overstuffed chairs, upholstered in deep teal velvet and gold braid, seemed to get its crowning effect in the great glittering chandeliers that hung like enormous mushrooms of iridescent crystal.

Wide, dividing pairs of stairs led to a lower level where a glass-enclosed room with its green latticed walls and ceilings blooming with a profusion of wisteria, seemed to carry the eye to the high hills and lavender horizon beyond. A fountain played in the middle of the room. They walked through other rooms, trailing off in all directions.

Byrd loved the tapestried brick of the Pompeian room with its arched ceiling which was known as the "Spring Room," for here every one came to drink the all-purshur waters that cured all ailments. There was the ballroom beyond where movies preceded the nightly dance and the open arcade leading to the swimming pool.

They wandered through the lower lobby where everything in the way of adornment was sold. Cuddling little bazaar and shops titilled the imagination and tugged at the purse strings with every known fable for the embellishment of the person.

There were beauty shops where distinctive bobs were cut for ten dollars per head, "molded by an artist to the contour of madame's head and designed to the line of madame's eyes and nose and mouth and the shape of her face."

Sport shops with outfit for golf, tennis, riding and bathing, art shops that shone under the artificial lights, of oriental novelties, of cut ivory, jade and semi-precious stones.

They followed the groups of America's plutocracy along the shaded walks to the tennis courts where people sat lazily all day long, under the gayly striped mammoth umbrellas, watching the national tournaments.

Now and then, Larry called Byrd's attention to an especially smart costume. Most of the girls had on marvelous outfits, with an unexpected touch there to show the master mind that had created it.

"Oh, now I know why Larry looked so queerly at my dress," thought Byrd. "It's terrible."
