State Department Studies Border Situation; Capture Of Rebels Brings Problem

WASHINGTON, March 14.—(AP)—With the crucial period of the Mexican revolution regarded by officials here as close at hand, a determination of the policy it will follow hereafter with respect to rebels crossing the boundary lines. Indications point strongly to the adoption of rigid regulations for the use of all means at the disposal of American authorities to prevent the return of the rebels to Mexican soil to continue their revolutionary activities.

Such a policy would be in keeping with the Pan-American convention of which Mexico and the United States are signatories. While the senate has not yet ratified the convention, the state department has indicated that it desires to carry out the spirit of the treaty especially since there appears no opposition to it in the senate.

Kellogg Eyes Situation Announcement was made by Secretary Kellogg today that he had begun a study to determine what policy will be followed in connection with rebels. While it was supposed that the inquiry would be directed at the detention and release of General Borques, a rebel who crossed Tuesday night at Nogales, Ariz., it was explained later that the study would be made to determine a general policy.

The circumstances surrounding General Borques' release by American immigration authorities are being studied but any conclusions arrived at are not expected to include censure of officials for their part in that incident.

Expense Considered The section of the Pan-American treaty dealing with the detention of rebels against a constituted government on the western hemisphere, provides that the expense of detention shall be borne by the government benefited. Thus, in the event American officials held large numbers of revolutionary soldiers, the expense of their keep would revert to the Mexican treasury and not that of this country.

In case the United States decided to carry out strictly the terms of the treaty American officials would disarm rebels detained and the ammunition and arms would be returned, once the struggle is terminated, to the Mexican federalists.

The treaty does not deal with the return of rebels into the hands of the authorities they struck against.

Yanks Believed Safe Meanwhile, there has been no reason for alarm in official circles for the safety of American lives and property in the war zone. The Mexican government is easing up on its embargo and is permitting supplies urgently needed by American business interests to come through.

The war department, however, has ordered the second squadron of the 10th cavalry and a company of infantry from Fort Huachuca, Ariz., to the border at Naco, Ariz., as a precautionary step to relieve any feeling of apprehension among Arizona citizens.

The troops were requested by Senator Ashurst, of Arizona, who explained to Mr. Good he desired to take every precaution for the safety of the water supply of Bisbee, a city eight miles from the border.
