Peter's Adventures

"FIRST AID" POOLS JACK FROST
When Peter was quite sure there was no danger of Duck slipping back into the pool, he dropped the stick, ran back to where the bird lay groaning, and knelt down beside him. "Well, old chap, you are safe now, I guess," said he. "Now that you are, I don't mind telling you that for a while I had my doubts about ever getting you out of that hole alive."

are thawed cut and are on your feet again and then you will tell a different tale. As for that dreadful aching I am sure it is not so much because you have been bruised as that the bumping you have received has started your blood to circulating which, of course, is the very best thing that could happen to you. "I'll be the doctor, Duck, and give you 'first aid' and fool Jack Frost. Come, let me roll you over on your back and stretch your wings out—so! Try to kick your legs a little. That's right! Fine! Do it again, and now again! Ah, ha! Feeling better already, aren't you? I thought so! Trying to stand up? Great! I knew you could do it." Duck did. With one heroic effort he flopped over and staggered to his feet. Swaying a second Duck stood still and then started off, dizzily enough to be sure, but still he found he could walk, and that cheered him up a lot. Turning he came back, flapping his wings up and down and quacking at the top of his lungs. "Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah!" screamed Duck. "I am all right again as sure as you are born. No damage done at all, only I am a little lame and hoarse. I can walk, I can quack, and I can even fly." The fellow hopped into the air and actually took a few "wings" to prove it. "And I owe it all to you!" Suddenly Duck stopped quacking and stood perfectly still, the strangest expression coming over his face as he gazed at the boy.
