Mothers

WHATEVER the individual characteristics with which we adorn the meaning of the word "mother." such as hair that waves a certain way, a voice that has a certain soft, lilting sing in it, an understanding that never fails, or a laugh that dispels the darkest cloud, whatever these individual meanings of the word "mother", there is the great universal love, all encompassing, and all forgiving to which the world in general thrills.

Today we present three stages of motherhood, each in its way as precious as the other-the unquestioning and unmarred bliss of the young mother for the tiny defenceless mite whose growth and sweetness is her whole world-then there is the complete and understanding comradeship which is perhaps the greatest single boon that we all take with us from the experience of "growing up"-and last there is the mother whose high calling has been met, and who has in the meeting developed all the attributes of motherhood. She has suffered, she has rejoiced, she has planned and accomplished; she has given the greatest gift—the love and help and train-ing which develops a life to its greatest possibilities, and she has received the second greatest gift within the reach of mankind-the adoration and comradship of those for whom she has worked.

Mother? In the true sense of that word there is no station in the realm of mankind so powerful, no power so potent in the directing of the affairs of the world, no influence so sweet in the lives of individuals as that of "mother".
