Many years ago there lived in Switzerland a man, who was known as an expert in the art of making Swiss cheese. This man had a son named Karl, who helped him in his work and soon learned to make the cheese as his father did. Years passed and finally Karl decided to seek his fortune in America.

After a time Karl Rohrer found himself in the town of Falls City. The mountains here were not unlike those of his native Switzerland and as there was much dairying in the region he began to make the Swiss cheese as his father had made it for 25 years. He also made butter, which proved to be more profitable than the cheese.

The Falls City creamery operated by Karl Rohrer takes in more than 1200 pounds of milk each day. Every day the milk is a little different and this difference must be discovered by test and the butter and cheese made according to the quality of the milk that day. It takes about two hours to make Swiss cheese from the whole milk but after it is made the cheese must ripen two months before it is ready for use. Mr. Rohrer makes on an average of 120 pounds of cheese each day.

Conditions are very different here from those in Switzerland. There the cheese is made the year round, but here it is impossible to make good quality cheese in warm weather so during June, July, August and September none is made at the Falls City creamery and all of the farmers bring cream instead of whole milk to Mr. Rohrer and only butter is made.

The cheese made here sells from 30 to 35 cents wholesale, but is retailed as high as 85 cents per pound in the Portland market.

The plant is to be enlarged in the near future and a large cooling room added. This will be of great advantage in both butter and cheese making and the output of the plant will be increased.

Mr. Rohrer likes Oregon and is glad that the people here appreciate his art and want the cheese and butter that he makes.
