CANNERIES ALL CONTINUE WORK

No Complete Cessation Reported Since Early Last Spring

By R. T. HENDRICKS As was foretold by this reporter a number of days ago, there has been no complete hiatus in canning and packing in Salem since the season began on gooseberries away last spring, and there will not be, till the last of the pumpkins and apples are put through, close to the end of the year.

The Paulus cannery is still going on loganberries; taking some berries that would have gone to other canneries but where the supply was too small for a paying run. The Paulus plant will finish on logans about tomorrow, but will go onto beets as soon as the machinery can be changed over, which will be in a few days. The canning of beets would be going on now, but for the epesistence of the loganberry crop season; last longer than was expected. Still, the Paulus people would have taken more loganberries if they had been available; perhaps 175 tons more. Carrot canning will go forward at this plant later in the season. And in the meantime, pears and evergreen blackberries will be taken on in quantities.

Four Hundred at Work The Oregon Packing company is working about 400 people, mostly in its 13th street plant, on beans, the rest at the 12th street plant, which is being rearranged for taking on pears and evergreen blackberries.

The Hunt cannery is dark now, waiting for pears and evergreens, which it is expected will come in quantities by Monday, the 26th. The Producers cooperative cannery, with all the others, is idle now, but Manager Gibson expects local pears to come in canning quantities in about two weeks, and evergreens about the same time, or a little later.

Other Harvests Opening There is already some harvesting of mint, and distilling of the peppermint oil, from plantings that are a high, dry soil not irrigated. General mint harvesting is under way.
