The Human Projectile One Big Feature Here

There is a thrill of expectancy in the air. The huge crowds at each performance of the Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus coming to Salem Thursday are tense and alert. From a rear entrance there is wheeled into the tent a huge cannon, camouflaged as in the days of the World war, measuring 21 feet in length and weighing 13,200 pounds.

As the gun is brought into position at one side of the hippodrome track, there appears the slender, well-built figure of a man—Hugo Zacchini, the human projectile—attired in the uniform of an Italian aviator. Zacchini climbs to the top of the gun, calmly surveys the crowds and then crawls feet first into the yawning breach.

On the ground below his brother, Bruno, calls out a signal, a question, "Are you ready, Hugo?" From deep inside the cannon comes the muffled reply. There is a flash of flame, a burst of smoke and from the great gun shoots forth Zacchini, to alight two and one-half seconds later in a net 100 feet away.

Twice each day Zacchini repeats this act; twice daily he defies death and nonchalantly smiles at danger.

As the denotation of the cannon reverberates through the tent the crowd is silent and hear and there a gasp of fear is heard. And then the storm of applause breaks forth, rivaling in its intensity and volume the report of the cannon itself. No act so breathtaking has ever before been attempted. Zacchini is himself the inventor of this marvelous machine. During the World war he served as a lieutenant in the Italian army and it was there he conceived the idea which has produced this greatest circus thrill.
