Ancient Willamette-Pacific Rivalry Again at High Mark

Bearcat Grid Team Set to Avenge Last Year's 6 to 0 Defeat

The Oregon state football championship among independent colleges will be at stake in the game here Saturday between the elevens of Willamette and Pacific univessities; but that is only a detail compared to the unadulerated question of supremacy between these two ancient rivals. This is true especially in the minds of old grads of the two schools concerned, but the same spirit has been banded down to the present collegiate generation.

These two denominational schools have been anathema to ette, we heard the awfulest roar, each other since late in the last century when football began to what pointed in their gloatings emerge from the status of a back over our poor guess afterward. lot kicking scramble, and football players let their hair grow long and luxuriant to protect their heads, helmets not yet having invented.

Teams at First Play on Even Terms

At first a good reason for this rivalry was to be found in the fact that supremacy shifted without prejudice from year to year, and it grew so intense in that time with an annual struggle.

Toward the end of this period Willamette's er sollment shrunk to about a par with that of Pacific, but when Bob Mathews was in charge at the Beareat institution. and his teams were always good enough to stay on top.

In 1921 two things happened Mathews went away from Willamette and Leo Frank came to Frank's elevens.

Frank is still on the job at Forest Grove, but his unbroken series of triumphs ended in 1926, the year Spec Keene appeared on the scene back of the Old Historic Temple. In the three years that have followed, Willamette has won twice and Pacific once, with not seven points between the two in

Suggestion to Relegate Men To Grandstand Meets With Derision

Hard games last week end, which brought with them along with victory a considerable number of casualties, have weakened both the Willamette and Pacific university gridiron squads, so that they are even on that score as their annual tussle looms near.
