The Masked Hostess

(Continued from Page 7) morning, for she had been fronic with her social secretary, had reprimanded two servants and dismissed another, and had told the butler to cut from the list of the house's tradesman a man who had sent some celery of which she disliked the flavor.

But she was in ill humor for all of that. She had reached "Flintstone" only the night before in a luxurious car driven by a French chauffeur, but she found the journey from Southampton uninteresting for much of the way and once her car had been kept waiting for a few minutes at a grade crossing. She glanced at her social secretary, when that young woman brought her a copy of Gotham Topics, with a special lift of brows expressing the fact that she was more than commonly annoyed. "Why," she demanded, in her coldest voice, "do you bring me this when you must be aware that I am much too tired to care to see The social secretary, however, left it, understanding fully that she would only be more deeply in her employer's ill graces if she

Mrs. Pemberton Swayne fell to Hotel dance orchestra a perusal of it at once after the secretary had gone. For in nearly every issue it contained an item or more which fed her self-approval and in addition, in the main, the gossip it purveyed was reliable. She liked its bits of malice too. So far its editors had never dared to take any liberty in writing of her. She read the following presently. It was what she had expected to find, and it suited her exactly except that there was not much more of it:

"Mrs. Pemberton Swayne and her four lovely daughters are at 'Flintstone,' Mrs. Swayne's Westbury place, having removed to there from 'The Links' at Southampton, where she always keeps her household in early September. Her arrival at Westbury, it need he said is notice to society to society the said is notice to society to society the said is notice to society to society the said is notice to society that there exactly blunched her exactly blunched her was not much blunched.

That was all right. There was another paragraph about somebody else and then this, which brought her upright among her pillows in speechless fury:

"The methods are devious and interesting, and often most amusing, by which, as we look about us, we see certain of the shrewder ones in high society disposing of country estates no longer wanted because of the scarcity and high cost of capable servants, or because the places they would be quit of are located in neighborhoods no longer desired by the smart.

"A pet trick is to open some unused house and give a series of vivid entertainments in it-and then, while it is being talked about unload it on some climber outside the walls who imagines he or she can buy his or her way in by paying the stiff price invariably asked for the unwieldy property. "Recently a shabby old Long Island place has received as its tenant a certain widely known sportsman whose gay parties-aye and whose ravishing hostesshave become the talk of country and town. We suspect the elever hand of a highly placed matronnot unknown to be not averse to making two dollars grow where only one grew before—as that behind the dashing horseman who is making society talk. If a sale can be stimulated it will remove from the lady's conscience the problem of the support of one of her young women relatives who recently became burdened with he place by inheritance. Meantime has cold commerce blinded the eyes of the lady we mean to the chance that the sportsman-host we write of may depart eventually for regions beneath the equator with his hostess as his bride rather than one of the four lovely daughters of the matron we imagine to be his co-partner in a bit of real estate promotion? reached Southampton. And also realizing that it must contain something to distress her and that some one-one of her daughters probably-had purposely kept it out of her sight. She found almost at once the couple of paragraphs in it which had announced the rental of "The Firs" by Stefano and told of his masked hostess. Then she summoned a servant and asked him to find Miss Sylvia the daughter she had meant to marry Stefane-if Miss Sylvin were anywhere about.

The servant went out to a tennis court where Sylvia sat re-dama canopied pavilion with another girl and two young men whom she had been playing dou-"Oh, brother," she said when the servant gave his message. And when he had gone, "Now, of course, mother's going to try and put the bee on it." It was she who had hidden the copy of Gotham Topics which her mother had missed seeing, not lest it distress Mrs. Swayne, but because, on the contrary, Sylvia wanted to pay a clandestine visit to "The Firs" and see the masked hostess before her mother "put the bee on it." She knew as she went toward the house to talk with her mother that Mrs. Swayne would be in a fury and would dissemble it, and that she would disparage Stefano, and would surely go to "The Firs" and see the mysterious masked hostess for herself. She was right in all three conjectures.

(To be continued tomorrow.)
