CHICKEN CANNING IS GROWING INDUSTRY

By MADALENE L. CALLIN
Few people who pass the little grey haired lady who is demonstrating Mione Brand of canned chicken at Roth's grocery this week realize that she represents one of Oregon's growing industries.

The little lady whose bright blue eyes and ready smile always bring a smile in return is Mrs. F. Smith of McMinnville and she is not a professional demonstrator, hired to sell the products of some firm, but rather she is a part of the firm she represents.

A little more than four years ago Mr. and Mrs. Smith got the notion that good canned chicken should find a ready sale.

They had never been in the cannery business and knew nothing of commercial formulas and large scale canning. Being essentially scientific they started experimenting in the home kitchen. They studied every angle of the chicken canning business. Mr. Smith traveled and studied market conditions. Mrs. Smith kept on experimenting with canning processes until a canned chicken was produced that had a distinct and delicious flavor, retaining the characteristics of the fresh cooked chicken.

A small amount was put on the market and found ready sale. This was four and one half years ago. Now an imposing cannery bearing the blue and white, "Mione Brand Chicken," sign appears on the Pacific Highway at McMinnville.

Here 22 women are employed and as high as three hundred hens are canned each day. They can nothing but large fat hens. Boned chicken, chicken noodles, chicken broth, chicken giblets, in fact there are 20 different labels bearing the Mione brand.

The home factory is under the constant supervision of at least one member of the Smith family. In addition to Mr. and Mrs. F. F. Smith their two sons W. F. and L. H. Smith devote their entire time to the work.

The greatest problem which the company has had to solve this year is that of securing enough chickens. Many farmers are making a business of raising chickens for the factory but the Smiths are constantly seeking more. No special breed of chicken is preferred but any full grown hen that is fat and up to weight is acceptable.
