

BEARCATS WIN FROM STRONG PORTLAND QUINT

CURT COMMENTS

Remember the row that was kicked up over whether the institution at Corvallis was Oregon Agricultural college or Oregon State college? The thing has just about settled itself now, with the school called just what the students want to call it, except that a few stubborn newspapers with University of Oregon news editors cling to the old name.

We hate to say "We told you so," but this is a good opportunity, as some readers who took the Statesman when that controversy was raging, may be able to testify.

Now we find a discrepancy in names used to designate the government Indian school located a few miles north of Salem. The official name is "Salem Indian school," but it has been customary to call it "Chemawa Indian school."

With all due respect to certain members of the local chamber of commerce who want to tie the city's name up with everything that might result in some publicity, we here and now declare it lost cause, because the students won't have it that way.

We have gone astray momentarily ourselves and written about the "Salem Indian school" athletic teams, but that was before we knew the students were otherwise minded. From now on, in the sports news anyway, it's "Chemawa."

Here is part of the letter we received on the subject Saturday:

"One of your 'radical' mornings why not say a word or two about the foolishness of trying to dub Chemawa 'Salem.' You're found out by now that, for one thing, it's unhandy.

"It's true enough that Salem Indian school is the official name, but it wasn't just named that. By the same method the U. S. is officially dry. Chemawa has had the other official title since it was moved to Salem 45 years ago or thereabouts, from Forest Grove, but the custom has always been to call it by the more appropriate name 'Chemawa.'

"The school songs and yells are about Chemawa, our paper is called the 'Chemawa American.' "At a chamber of commerce meeting the other day at which Mr. Lipps was the speaker, somebody got up and made a rather impassioned speech on this subject of the name and it was, of course, pro-Salem Indian school. Mr. Slasson, who was presiding, agreed with him—mildly—talked for a little while and then, in referring to the school, called it 'Chemawa.' That's an example of how naturally the name fits."

The big issue down at Eugene in the last few days has been, "Did Dr. Spears call here incognito or not?" The newspaper states positively that Dr. Spears was there, and was considering the coaching job. Dr. Spears denied both claims. The newspaper went on to assert that Dr. Spears was no longer being considered, and that it was just as well that a man who would pretend like that should be passed up. What high ideals we are demanding of our coaches these days!
