Clarissa left discreetly to allow him to read a telegram he had just received. He opened it nervously and read it quickly. Then he reread it to be sure he had made no mistake. When he had quite made up his mind what to do, he sought out Sir Michael Propert in the garden and requested him to come into the library for a moment.

"I have just received secret in-formation," Disraeli began, without ceremony, when the two had scated themselves on the couch. He looked around uneasily and then got up to close the door leading into the reception room. "Extraordinary how voices travel," he explained. Propert looked as if he did not
