"Well-there's a night mail tonight at nine." "Now!" Disraeli said rising. "In ten minutes." In the next few weeks the doctor called often at the Disraeli home, really to treat Lady Beaconsfield. But London would have it that Disraeli himself was ill, and every newspaper carried a report to that effect. Disraeli, meanwhile, busied himself at home with his garden and his peacocks. it was not a bad idea at that particular time to allow England to believe he was inactive. When the thing was settled, that would be the time to show himself. Clarissa came daily for two reasons. She was waiting for news from Charles, and she wanted to be with Lady Beaconsfield as much as possible because she was not well. After many anxious days of waiting, news came at last. Disraeli read Charles's telegram to the two women.

"The celery is ripe to cut." Disraell replied to their looks of surprise by showing them the code in which the message was written. "That means," he explained, "the Sues Canal Purchase is completed and the cheque accepted."
