By CARL GREGG DONET
President Willamette University

The casual appraisal of a city is made by regarding its tangible values. One easily development dates from its beginning. Its founders were not adventurers seeking spoils. They represented a more culture and their objective was to propagate education and religion in the new land. A people in former enriched whose pioneer forebears make it their first business to establish a school and a church. It is these institutions which structure life with verity and become the roofing places of abiding inner wealth.

Salem was founded in an atmosphere of intelligence and morality, and in such an atmosphere it has had its being.

Willamette university was contemporaneous with the first homes and earliest enterprises of this city. It took its character from those who organized it and for almost a century it has turned that character back into the citizens of the community. It has kept pace with modern educational developments and has always been a voice that called the people toward intelligence and goodness. Naturally, too, it attracted families to Salem who appreciated higher education and here many of them have remained, themselves becoming patrons of culture and refinement.

Citizens such as these would provide themselves with libraries and churches, with societies for study in music, the drama and fine arts. Whatever be a person's wishes, he here finds opportunities and friends of kindred desires. Tradition and atmosphere encourage him to appreciate and to develop the better elements of his nature.

The strong undercurrent of the city is cultural.

A visitor after observing Salem remarked, "I can see that great men were once here." To support his statement he spoke of the wisdom reflected in planning the city to have broad, clean streets; he pointed to the architectural perfection of the First Methodist church, of the courthouse, capitol and certain residences; he marveled at the civic center with its atmosphere of intelligence and

AVERAGE RAINFALL IN SALEM

The average rainfall in Salem is 27 1/2 inches, about the same as Kansas City or St. Louis. It is just a little more than Chicago and considerably less than New York City or Boston.

The Willamette river at Salem was frozen over in the year 1861 and not again until 1923. That's an average of once every 62 years.
