8 CENT CHERRY PRICE LIKELY

California Growers Holding Out For Same Rate, Report Says

Prospects for an eight cent price for Royal Anne cherries for Oregon growers looked good Monday with receipt of word here from the California Cherry Growers' association that buyers were talking eight cents for their crop. The association has determined not to name any price until Thursday of this week.

The California crop is supposed to be about the same as in 1929, although some reports say it will run from 7000 to 8000 tons in contrast to 8000 to 9000 tons last year. No sales of cherries have yet been made, a wire from the California association to Max Gehlhar shows.

The Salem association of cherry growers recently put a price of eight cents on the Royal Anne crop here this year. To this fourth of one cent is to be added for the association's handling charge.

While the price is not extremely high it is considered fairly good in comparison with the outlook for peach and pear prices. A heavy peach and pear crop looms in California which means that prices of $85 a ton received for pears in 1929 will probably be cut to $30 to $40 a ton this year. Gehlhar said Monday that the peach prices would probably be only 50 per cent of 1929. Last year the peach crop was light and the price high. This year's peach crop in California will apparently be a bumper one.

Willamette Prof Recalls Era When High Fence Kept Cows Off College Campus

Stories of the days when the Willamette campus was surrounded by a board fence to keep out cattle were recalled and repeated Monday in chapel by Professor James T. Matthews, who entered the academy then connected with the university in 1883.

"In those days," said Professor Matthews, "three subjects were highly respected: Latin, Greek, and mathematics. Science—well, it was listed in the catalogue. Oh, I tell you, you couldn't get by in those days."

"Every student at his first class on Monday morning responded to roll call by answering three questions: Had he attended chapel every day during the past week? Had he attended church on Sunday? Had he studied in his room every evening but Saturday from seven to nine?"

"Entertainment was limited; none but the bravest dared go to the theatre, and if one did, there was always the carpet! Each call to the carpet meant one demerit, and three demerits spelled dismissal."

Professor Matthews told of the time when he himself was called into the president's office. He had taken two young ladies to church the Sunday morning after his matriculation. The president pointed out to him a statement in the catalogue to the effect that Willamette co-eds entertained no gentlemen except in the parlor.

"All the members of the faculty," said the narrator, "were Prince-Albert cows, but never pressed their trousers."

"Classes were called by a large bell, rung by the president and heard by all the townspeople."

"There was no organized student body and no student organizations existed with the exception of two literary societies."

"Willamette at that time was going through a good many hardships. In fact, we were just about ready to sell out to the sheriff. A three-day dissection convention was called, and was attended by a bishop of one Methodist church and several other prominent men from the east."

"One day the bishop, speaking in a chapel filled with students and friends of the university called for a yell. We were shocked to think of yelling in that sacred place, but one young man went to the platform; he and the bishop managed to contrive a yell and he yelled it. That was Willamette university's first yell."

Professor Matthews, who has been head of the mathematics department since 1923, has been a member of the Willamette faculty longer than any other man or woman.
