"The Sea Bride"

(Continued from Page 4) "Noll, you're the master of this ship," she said thoughtfully. "Old Jonathan felt put her in your charge. You are responsible for her. And that puts certain obligations on you Noll. An obligation to be wise, and to be prudent, and to be brave."

He came back and sat down beside her. She touched his knee. "You are like a king aboard here, Noll. And—the king can do no wrong. I would not go to Mauder if I were you. You made a mistake, but there is no need you should humble yourself before the men. They would not understand; they would only despise you, Noll."

"Let them!" he said hotly. "They're sneaking, spineless!" "Let them fear you; let them hate you," she told him. "But—never let them forget you are master, Noll. Don't go to Mauder."

He had no real desire to go. He wished only to bask in her newfound sympathy. And he yielded readily enough at last.

The matter passed abruptly. She rose; he went up on deck; the Sally Sims went on her way. And for a day or two Noll Wing, an old man, was like a boy who has repented of a mistake and is nursing her mother-in-law.
