ONE DEAD IN RIOT

On the Sidelines
By BRIAN BELL

Henry P. Edwards, manager of the service bureau of the American league, has undertaken an investigation based on the question, "What is the matter with minor league baseball?" He explains, however, that he does not refer to the fault of the leagues, but to the players.

The hope of the minor leagues lies in selling players to the majors, he points out, and the major league clubs want young players. The average age of the American league players at the beginning of July, according to Edwards, was 27.5 and the same player average in the National league was 29.

At the same time the average of American association players was equal to that of the National league, while the average of all the players in the American association, Pacific Coast, International, Southern association, Texas and New York Penn leagues exceeded the average of the American league by more than three-quarters of a year.

The average age of 1,509 players composing the rosters of the 11 leading minor leagues was only one-tenth of a year under that of the American league.

The "old age malady," as Henry calls it, he finds has about run its course. His figures show that during the season of 1928 the 1,506 players employed by 11 minor leagues of AA, A and B classification were of an average age of 27.5 years. In 1930 the average has been reduced to 27.4 years.

The average age of 96 players in the "Bally" was 24.8. The III (Three Eye) with 124 players counted, showed 25.4. The Southeastern, 94 players, was 27. The New York-Penn, 27.8, based on 119 players.

The Western league has an age batting average of 25.9, with 131 players included. The Eastern league, before its reduction in membership, showed an average of 26.4 in 141 players.

CURT COMMENTS

"Wanted—Boy with bicycle to work in grocery store all day." (ad in Oregonian.) We've heard of clerks on roller skates, and fighters who rode their bicycles backward all the time, but a cycling bean shooter is something new.

Typical excerpt from report on national air races at Chicago: "He crashed his plane to avoid hitting the crowd... The crowd rushed onto the field, screaming."

You'd naturally suppose the spectators were screaming in horror, but flying men assure us they're screaming for blood. It's a settled conviction with some of them that crowds attend air races and maneuvers hoping to see somebody killed, and go away disappointed if there isn't at least one good crash.

So the inevitable question is, these self-effacing fliers killing themselves off in a poor cause? Wouldn't it be better for them to drop on a cushion of bloodthirsty spectators, easing the fall for themselves and at the same time giving the crowd its money's worth.

Wonder where all the semi-pro ball players we used to see around here have gone? A glance at the Timber league box scores goes quite a way toward answering that question. The Longview lineup contains the name of our own Harry Cloninger, playing left field; also Leo Cole, Sax and Covert, who have been here with various teams in the past.

Kelso gives us Hepting and Bigbee as well as some others whom we have known only in the Timber uniform. Trummer is playing with Tacoma; we see no mention of his old sidekick Rentford. There's also a Gillihan in the Tacoma lineup; but we're old C. P. S. friend.

Eugene won that April game from Corvallis Sunday, which apparently means we'll have Billy Reinhardt and his crew here to start the big series next Sunday.

A woman writes in, regretting that the "W's" feature isn't running as regularly as it used to. She declares that little paragraph hit a good many "homers," and adds that if she lived in Salem, she knows she'd be able to furnish us one every day. And to prove it, contributed this one:
