Mr. Petrie states that the grain yield around his old home at Touchet, is about double per acre this year to what it has been in recent years, and strangely enough in this age of modern progress, the farmers there attribute this to the fact that they reverted this year to the old method of farming with mule power instead of tractor power. Possibly the tendency to overwork ground with a tractor might be a factor in this case, and according to Mr. Petrie, the farmers there consider that they have now just learned that the old style of farming is best in their particular section.
