RIVER ISLE TO PRIVATE OWNER

State Loses in High Court's View; Judge Walker Is Sustained

The state supreme court, in an opinion written by Justice Rand, yesterday affirmed the decree of Judge Arlie Walker of the Polk county circuit court, in a suit brought by the state land board against James Imlah and others to quiet title to what the state claimed is an island formed by the current of the Willamette river. The lower court held for the defendants.

The alleged island is located near the west bank of the Willamette river, approximately one mile north of Salem. The state claimed title to the island by virtue of its ownership and sovereignty over the beds of navigable streams within its borders. The defendants own the lands bordering the west bank of the river directly west of the premises in controversy, and claimed the same as an accretion to their property.

Proof Burden on State—"The burden of proving the state's ownership rested upon the state," read the supreme court opinion. "The evidence offered by the state wholly fails to show the title in the state. The evidence shows that when the boundaries of the lands actually patented are traced upon the ground, the lands patented include much of the disputed territory and if it should be assumed that the low water mark was identical with the exterior boundaries of the patented lands, then the lands lying between such exterior lines and the low water mark of the river are all attached to the patented lands and constitute merely an accretion thereof."

"Under these circumstances we think the rule 'once a riparian owner, always a riparian owner' should be applied."

WATER RIGHTS TO STATE ALONE, WORD

Washington Dept. Wires Stricklin he Need not Worry Over Matter

Any release of the waters of the Klamath river, regardless of the purpose, will be in favor of the state of Oregon, according to a telegram received here Saturday by C. E. Stricklin, state engineer, from Otis Smith, chairman of the federal power commission at Washington.

The telegram was in reply to a query sent to Washington yesterday in which Stricklin declared his opposition to having the waters of the stream released to the California-Oregon Power company or any other corporation. The engineer previously had been advised that negotiations were in progress whereby the power company hoped to obtain release of the waters for development purposes.

Stricklin set out in his correspondence with the federal reclamation department that the attorney general of Oregon had held that the waters of the Klamath river were not subject to appropriation until a release had been signed by the proper official of the reclamation bureau of the interior department.

The California-Oregon Power company sometime ago made five power filings on the Klamath river. These filings are now pending action of state and federal officials.
