Teletype's Use In Catching of Crooks Eyed

Teletypes, such as are used by some of the larger states in the apprehension of criminals, were demonstrated Tuesday at the request of Governor Meier and Charles Fray, superintendent of the new state police department created by the 1931 legislature.

The teletypes in operating here were connected with police departments at Seattle, Portland, San Francisco and other larger cities on the Pacific coast.

Governor Meier expressed himself as pleased with their operation.

Teletypes may be adopted as permanent equipment of the new state police department, officials said.

DRUGS' EVOLUTION CITED BY ZIEFLE

Oregon Profuse in Medicinal Herbs; Development of Foxglove Is Urged

Tersely, Dean Adolph Ziefle told Kiwanians yesterday about the "Evolution of Drugs." He packed in 20 minutes an interesting variety of facts about pharmacists, their work and their products, and won hearty applause from his audience.

Every tribe, no matter its state of civilization, had developed a "materia medica" Ziefle said. Nature in the vegetable and mineral kingdom has been lavish in providing preparations which are specifics for many illnesses. Of late, the animal kingdom has been yielding an increasing number of medicines for the cure of human ailments.

Oregon has a number of products which have high curative value, the speaker declared. He mentioned cascara bark, found only in this region and since very profitable until substitutes were perfected. Digitalis or foxglove, a specific for heart ailments, grows profusely here and should be developed as a product of the state Ziefle said, in competition with large importations from England. Golden seal and pepermint are two other curative plants native to Oregon.

Necessity has been the mother of many valuable discoveries in medicine, Ziefle said. He pointed to insulin discovered recently by Banting of Toronto, to the development of chloroform a century ago, to ether's use in 1842, to anthrax treatment developed by Pasteur in 1883 and to diphtheria antitoxin perfected in 1889.

Oregon at the state college has a well-equipped and high-rated pharmacist's school Ziefle said. He pointed with pride to the model drug store there installed and said all students must master a rigid four-year course in order to be pharmacists in this state. The druggist is bound by law to keep his drugs pure and fresh and to compound them with skill.

Ziefle said he considered the stock phrase "try your druggist first" extremely foolish and he also criticized the expression, "Your druggist is more than a merchant." He termed a model drug store one without "cigars, candy, soda fountains and sandwiches."
